The Washington Post does not always see eye to eye with the Judiciary Committee or with the Senator from South Carolina, but I was very pleased to read in the Washington Post today, February 6, 1984, an editorial entitled "DOA in the House?"

DOA IN THE HOUSE?

Does the idea of a comprehensive revision of the federal criminal code sound familiar? It should. It's been kicking around Capitol Hill since 1966, when a national commission was created to review the law and prepare a recodification. In 1971, President Nixon established a special unit in the Justice Department to continue the work of the commission, and in 1973 a bill was introduced by Sens. Hruska and McClellan. It has been reintroduced in one form or another in every Congress since.

The Senate has a history of giving serious consideration to criminal code revision. Why shouldn't it? The subject is of paramount interest to voters, the proposals are the product of long years of expert deliberation and wide-ranging hearings, and the legislative documents themselves offer tens of thousands of pages of information and recommendations. The country has invested both resources and talent in this effort, and it is certainly worthy of consideration by Congress. Why, then, when the bill passed the Senate once again last week, did some House wag pronounce it "deal on arrival" in that chamber? It seems that the House "dosen't like the comprehensive approach" and prefers to consider each change in the criminal law as an individual matter.

Over the past 18 years, proponents of comprehensive reform have made concessions in order to build consensus. This year, for example, they took a number of controversial subjects out of the bill—capital punishment, the exclusionary rule and control of the drug enforcement program, to name a few. Still, the remaining 387-page measure dealt with dozens of important issues. Sentencing and parole, bail procedures, organized crime, the insanity defense and assistance to state and local law enforcement organizations were all included. After five days of debate the measure was passed by the Senate on a vote of 91-1, a fair indication of bipartisan consensus.

Great credit is due the Senate coalition led by Sens. Thurmond and Biden, who had to bargain, negotiate and compromise with opponents on both ends of the political spectrum to win passage of the bill. If they are exasperated by the cavalier decision of some House members not even to look at this package seriously, it is understandable. It won't do to pick one or two items out of hundreds of reforms and throw the rest out without any consideration. The bill put together after more than a decade of work and passed by an almost unanimous Senate deserves a respectful hearing and a thorough debate by the House.

Mr. President, I want to give credit to the Washington Post for this editorial which I think signifies the public sentiment on this bill from almost all points of view. Now, S. 1762 was not really a part of the Criminal Code revision effort, such as S. 1630 last Congress. We will come back to that in the future. Right now we are dealing with a package that contains many of the provisions that were in the recodification bills—such as bail, sentencing, and forfeiture—and extracted those and put them in this package. We hope we can pass these measures now and at some time in the future return to the effort to modernize and revise the whole Federal criminal law. In fact, enactment of S. 1762 should facilitate ultimate Federal Criminal Code revision because many of the important things would already be the law. I am very, very pleased this package has passed the Senate. I hope that S. 1762 will pass the House. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I am sure, will give the matter careful consideration, and we hope he will see fit to parcel out to the various subcommittees the provisions of this package for which each subcommittee has jurisdiction, and then, after they have acted, to reassemble them in the package for House action.

We hope the Speaker will bring it up for action.

Then, Mr. President, if there are any differences from the Senate bill, we can go to conference and settle those differences.

Mr. President, I am very pleased to see this editorial. I think it speaks the sentiment of the public in every State in this Nation to get something done to relieve the crime situation.

Mr. President, crime has been rampant in this Nation. An aggravated assault is committed in this country every 49 seconds; a robbery every 59 seconds; a forcible rape every 7 minutes; a murder every 25 minutes. Those are violent crimes. These are classified as violent crimes. Mr. President, there were 1,285,705 violent crimes committed in 1982 as reflected in the 1982 FBI Major Crimes Index reports. That is in addition to property crimes. There is a motor vehicle theft committed every 30 seconds; a larceny theft every 4 seconds; a burglary every 9 seconds. Property crimes aggregated over 11,571,513 in 1982. There is a violent crime committed in this Nation every 25 seconds, less than every half a minute. There is a property crime committed every 3 seconds.

Now, Mr. President, there really is no excuse for this Congress not taking action to relieve this situation. The public wants it done, the administration wants it done, the Justice Department has made recommendations, the Senate Judiciary Committee has acted, the full Senate has acted, and we plead with the House, we plead with the Speaker, we plead with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the entire House to please take action on this crime package this session of Congress.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend past 5:20 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 2257. A bill entitled the "Senior Citizens Tax Improvement Act"; to the Committee to Finance.

SENIOR CITIZENS TAX IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, every so often a constituent comes to a Member of Congress with a problem that makes your blood boil. That happened to me a few months ago, when an 82-year-old women arrived at my Kansas City office.

In her hand was a startling notice from the Internal Revenue Service about the tax return filed by her 84-year-old sister, who is confined to a wheelchair. In simple form, here is what the notice said:

Tax owed	$515.00
Tax paid	514.40
Underpayment	.60
Penalty	50.24
Interest	.04
Amount due	50.88

I hope that every Member of the Senate is as startled, and as dismayed, by those numbers as I was. This woman had underpaid her taxes by 60 cents and she was billed for penalty and interest totaling $50.28. Those figures are so excessive, so absurd that I was ready to flay the hide of the first IRS official I could reach.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, when my staff talked with the IRS office in Austin, Tex., we found that the problem was far worse than even those figures suggested. What I learned is that this was not an IRS mistake, nor was it bureaucratic zeal. Even worse, the IRS said that this problem is not new, and it is not unique. An estimated 300,000 elderly taxpayers are billed for this same kind of penalty each year, despite generally conscientious efforts to pay their fair share of taxes.

IRS officials were completely sympathetic to the problem of my constituent. They agreed that in this case, and nearly all others like it, the penalty should be waived since there was no intent to evade taxes. Here is the catch, Mr. President. Under current tax law, the IRS has no authority to waive these penalties. They would like to, but they cannot because of laws that we in Congress have passed.

So that every Senator can understand what is going on, let me briefly describe what happened to my constituent in Kansas City. For most of her life, she had income taxes withheld from wages and salary, After she retired, she lived on interest income, which was never enough to require the payment of taxes. Then, last year, she was forced to sell some of her securities to make ends meet. This one-time transaction increased her income for that year, so she filed an income tax return and paid what she thought was due. She underpaid by 60 cents. But that was not the problem.

According to IRS, the problem was that she had not filed a quarterly estimated tax return. She didn't file it because she had never heard of it. She had never had enough income from interest or dividends to even be aware that an estimated tax payment was required. That is true of millions of Americans, who are used to having income taxes withheld from wages but are not familiar with estimated tax returns on other forms of income. Most Americans never learn about those requirements until they retire and begin drawing on their life's savings to live. Like this woman in Kansas City, that is when they get a tax bill with a penalty they never expected.

By working with the IRS, my staff was able to get the penalty reduced for this constituent. It turned out that IRS had applied a penalty for the entire tax year when in fact she owed it only for one quarter. However, the IRS could not waive that portion of the penalty, and she was forced to pay it.

Mr. President, when a law is unfair, it is up to the Congress to change it. This law is patently unfair. The IRS agrees that it is, I believe the administration will agree that it is, and I believe most of the Members of this Congress will agree that it is. I believe every American, regardless of age, should pay their fair share of taxes. Most elderly American's do that—or at least try to. But they should not be hit with outlandish penalties for failing to memorize the Federal Tax Code.

Unfortunately, this is not the first time this problem has been brought to the attention of the Congress. In 1982, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) introduced legislation to allow the IRS to waive estimated tax penalties for elderly or retired citizens, if the failure to file was not due to willful neglect. Despite Mr. HEINZ's efforts, this problem is still unresolved 2 years later.

Along with Senator HEINZ, I am introducing legislation today to take care of this problem. It is time for the Congress to take action, and we should do it now.

Failure to address this situation will continue an undue and unfair hardship on many law-abiding elderly citizens. I urge support for this legislation and ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2257

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 6654 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to failure by individuals to pay estimated income tax) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(i) EXCEPTION FOR ELDERLY OR RETIRED TAXPAYERS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, the addition to tax with respect to any underpayment of estimated tax (or any portion thereof) shall not be imposed under subsection (a) if the Secretary finds that—

"(A) the taxpayer is retired or at least 65 years of age, and

"(B) such underpayment (or any portion thereof) was due to reasonable cause and not to willful neglect.

"(2) REASONABLE CAUSE.—If any portion of an underpayment of estimated tax by the taxpayer is due to mistake or ignorance of the law on the part of such taxpayer, such underpayment shall be treated, for purposes of paragraph (1), as due to reasonable cause and not willful neglect."

(b) Section 6654(a) of such Code (relating to addition tax tax) is amended by inserting ", (f), or (i)" after "subsection (d)."

(c)(1) The amendments made by this Act shall apply to estimated tax for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983.

(2) The Secretary of the Treasury shall issue the regulations required under section 6654(i) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 by no later than December 31, 1984.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague, Senator KASSEBAUM, in introducing this legislation, which I originally introduced in 1982. This legislation will have a beneficial impact on hundreds of thousands of elderly and retired Americans, through a small improvement of the Tax Code.

The bill amends the Tax Code's penalties for failure to pay estimated tax by allowing the Internal Revenue Service to waive or reduce the penalties for elderly and retired people where there is "reasonable cause." Without this bill, the elderly will have to bear the burden of $40 million in tax penalties that they can ill afford and which, in most cases, should not be inflicted upon them because of innocent mistakes.

The problem is this: Many elderly people shift from wage earner to retiree status, and their taxable income from pensions, dividends, and interest is not subject to withholding. These newly retired people are often unaware that the IRS requires them to make a declaration of estimated tax and pay regular, quarterly tax payments. When tax time comes along, these people fill out their returns and pay what taxes they owe. But later, they get a letter from the IRS computers notifying them that they have not complied with the rules on estimated tax, and that they must pay a penalty—which IRS has no discretion to waive.

Thus, retired Americans who have paid taxes properly all their lives suddenly end up with the unwelcome surprise that they are being penalized on account of a provision they were unaware of—because it never really applied to them before. In 1979, about 313,000 tax returns incurred estimated tax penalties primarily because of taxable pensions.

The penalty problem is also more urgent now, because the IRS has announced that the interest rate on tax underpayments, which is the basis for the penalty for failure to pay estimated tax, has risen from 12 to 20 percent, effective February 1, 1982. Whether or not the higher interest rate may be justified for general tax policy, the 20-percent charge is altogether usurious in the case of elderly people, whose limited income from savings has already been penalized by high rates of inflation. Further, because the code treats this interest charge as a penalty, it is not deductible from the following year's taxes—as all other interest charges are.

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA) contained provisions that raise the tax threshold liability for required payment of estimated tax, from $100 in 1981 to $200 in 1982, $300 in 1983, $400 in 1984, and $500 in 1985 and thereafter.

The ERTA provision originated in the House version of the tax bill, and the legislative history is germane. In its report on H.R. 4242, the House Ways and Means Committee stated its concern that—

> The $100 tax liability threshold for filing estimated taxes is too low.
> Often individuals with modest amounts of income that is not subject to withholding discover that they either must declare and pay estimated taxes or subject themselves to penalties for failure to do so. Accordingly, the committee has agreed to raise the tax liability threshold for individual estimated tax payments to $500. However, in order to minimize the immediate potential revenue loss of this change, the committee decided to phase in the increase over a 4-year period.

In short, the legislative history shows that Congress realized that there is a problem now with this estimated tax provision and the required penalties for failure to comply with the current law, but for reasons of cost, Congress decided to phase in the higher tax liability threshold over 4 years. This change will certainly be a substantial help, once it is fully phased in. But in 1982 and 1983, it affords very little help to the elderly. The Federal Government will continue to impose penalties, and the elderly people especially will suffer an undeserved penalty of $40 million, even though these people had no knowledge of the estimated tax requirements.

This legislation will complement the recent changes in ERTA. It gives the IRS the discretion to waive the penalties or reduce them for elderly or retired taxpayers, where there is reasonable cause. The bill applies only to the penalty and not to the amount of the tax liability.

The IRS has been doing its best to get the word out to older Americans about the estimated tax penalties. But despite their admirable efforts, many elderly people are still snared by this penalty. The Special Committee on Aging has received hundreds of letters from elderly Americans and from groups who serve them. In response, the Aging Committee has emphasized the need to make estimated tax payments in the tax information it makes available each year.

But the only way to really fix this problem is to fix the law itself. We must program into the computer which now sends out these estimated tax penalties—automatically—a small dose of human understanding for the elderly people who fall victim to the complexities of the tax law.

I urge my colleagues to join us in sponsoring this legislation.

Thank you.

S. 2258. A bill to grant a Federal charter to the 369th Veterans' Association; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FEDERAL CHARTER FOR THE 369TH VETERANS' ASSOCIATION

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to grant a Federal charter to the 369th Veterans' Association.

The bill is identical to a measure originally introduced in the House of Representatives by my friend and distinguished colleague from New York, Representative CHARLES B. RANGEL. On November 14, 1983, Congressman RANGEL'S proposal was passed by the House by a vote of 406-0. It would be fitting and proper for the Senate also to pass this bill, and I am hopeful that Senators will join me in support of the measure.

I would like first to speak to the illustrious history of the 369th Army Infantry Regiment in World War I—and to its veterans continuing record of outstanding civic service. Then I would like to speak about what a Federal charter is and why it would be appropriate for the Congress to grant one to the 369th Veterans' Association.

As many Senators will know, the association is named for what was once the all-black 369th Infantry Regiment which was organized in Harlem in New York City on June 29, 1916, and dispatched abroad the following year to serve alongside the French Army.

The heroism of the men of the 369th soon became the stuff of legend. The regiment was the most highly decorated American unit to serve in the First World War. The 369th Regiment participated in the campaigns at Champagne-Marne and Meuse-Argonne in 1917, and at Alsace and Champagne in 1918. During this crucial period of the war, the 369th spent 191 days engaged in the horror of trench warfare—the longest period of combat duty of any American unit to serve in the war. The 369th never lost a foot of ground—not a single member of the regiment was captured.

During World War I the 369th Regiment was cited 11 times for courage under fire. The entire unit was awarded the Croix de Guerre by the Government of France. Fittingly, this regiment of remarkable men was the first allied unit to reach the Rhine River and later, was the regiment that led the parade down Fifth Avenue when New York City welcomed home its veterans.

I would also remind my colleagues that Hamilton Fish, Sr., a distinguished former member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York served as captain and company commander of the 369th Regiment during World War I.

In World War II, the 369th Regiment became the 369th Anti-Aircraft Gun Battalion. The regiment served in the Pacific with distinction—particularly at Ryukyus during the Okinawa campaign. Later after the segregation of the Armed Forces was discontinued by order of President Harry S. Truman in Korea, the regiment continued its commendable record of courageous service to the Nation.

The 369th Veterans' Association was founded in 1954, in order to preserve and advance this tradition of selfless service and patriotism. It is today a nonprofit organization made up of more than 2,000 former servicemen and servicewomen, both black and white, from over 40 States and territories, each member committed to serving this Nation in times of war and peace. Membership is open to all honorably discharged men and women who have served in the Armed Forces.

The association is a unique organization with an impressive history of community service, not only in New York, but across the country. Among its many accomplishments, the association has provided counseling to veterans and direct assistance to veterans hospitals. It has sponsored scholarship and tutorial programs for children in need and a host of vital service for the elderly including the purchase of medical equipment for senior citizen centers. The association has rehabilitated three apartment buildings in New York City and sponsored the construction of the Gen. Chauncey M. Hooper Towers, a multimillion-dollar housing development designed for senior citizens and the handicapped.

Why, then, should the 369th Veterans' Association be granted a Federal charter?

Mr. President, since 1791 the Congress has granted Federal charters to private, nonprofit corporations which undertake educational, charitable, and benevolent activities with a national purpose or scope. Historically, these corporations have been educational institutions, veterans organizations, and sundry cultural and benevolent societies. A Federal charter recognizes an existing State-chartered organization and acknowledges the nationwide character of its benevolent activities. It does not expand corporate rights nor does it relieve any of the corporate responsibilities established by its State charter.

Until 1965, Congress granted Federal charters on a case-by-case basis without applying standard criteria for Federal incorporation—each bill was consideration on its own merits. In 1965, President Johnson vetoed a bill designating a Federal charter and raised the important question of granting charters on a case-by-case basis without the benefit of clearly established criteria as to eligibility. He called on the House and Senate Judiciary Committee—to which such bills are referred—to conduct a comprehensive study on the matter of Federal charters. Four years later, in 1969, the House and Senate Judiciary Committees jointly issued a statement of policy entitled: "Standards for the Granting of Federal Charters." The statement defined the minimum standards that a private organization must demonstrate in seeking a Federal charter. These standards do not have the force of law but they are valuable guidelines for the purposes of congressional deliberation.

Mr. President, the 369th Veterans' Association fully meets the standards established by the Judiciary Committees for the granting of Federal charters. The association is organized under a corporate charter, granted by the State of New York in 1954. It has operated continuously since this date as a nonpartisan and nonprofit organization. It is organized and operated solely for charitable, educational and patriotic purposes. The association performs activities on a national scale and is unique in its glorious history and the scope of its programs, such that a Federal charter is the appropriate form of incorporation.

The 369th Veterans' Association is an organization that merits the recognition of Congress and the American people. The granting of a Federal charter is a natural and proper gesture.

I invite my colleagues to join in cosponsoring this legisation to grant a charter to a truly worthy organization. Too often we bemoan the ills that sometimes plaque our Nation, let us now honor our best.●

"GRANTS FOR ACID DEPOSITION ABATEMENT; ACID DEPOSITION REDUCTION TRUST FUND

"Sec. 188. (a) The Administrator shall make grants to States in the acid deposition impact region from the Acid Deposition Reduction Fund (established under subsection (c)) for the purpose of assisting utilities in meeting the emission reduction requirements imposed by this part. All grants made under this section shall be used by such States to assist such utilities in meeting such requirements.

(b)(1) The amount of the grant to each such State for each fiscal year shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount available for such fiscal year in the Acid Deposition Reduction Trust Fund, as the actual net after tax expenses incurred by utilities in such State in meeting the emission reduction requirements of this part bears to the actual net after tax expenses incurred by utilities in all the States in the acid deposition impact region in meeting such emission reduction requirements; except that no grant to any State shall exceed 90 percent of the actual net after tax expenses incurred by utilities in such State in meeting such emission reduction requirements.

"(2) The Administrator shall by regulation determine the method for allocating net expenses incurred by utilities in meeting the emission reduction requirements of this part.

"(c)(1) There is established in the Treasury of the United States a trust fund to be known as the 'Acid Deposition Reduction Trust Fund' (hereinafter in this part referred to as the 'Trust Fund'), consisting of such amounts as may be appropriated or transferred to such Trust Fund as provided in this section.

"(2) There are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Trust Fund amounts determined by the Secretary of the Treasury (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'Secretary') to be equivalent to the total amount of the fees received in the Treasury under subsection (d) of this section.

"(3) Amounts in the Trust Fund shall be used only for the purpose of making grants under subsection (a) of this section to utilities required to reduce sulfur dioxide emissions under the provisions of this part.

"(4) The amounts appropriated by paragraph (2) shall be transferred at least monthly from the general fund of the Treasury to the Trust Fund on the basis of estimates made by the Secretary of the amounts referred to in such paragraph. Proper adjustments shall be made in the amount subsequently transferred to the extent prior estimates were in excess of or less than the amounts required to be transferred.

"(5) The Secretary shall be the trustee of the Trust Fund, and shall report to the Congress for each fiscal year, on the financial condition and the results of the operations of such Trust Fund during such fiscal year and on its expected condition and operations during the next five fiscal years.

"(6) It shall be the duty of the Secretary to invest such portion of the Trust Fund as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments shall be in public debt securities with maturities suitable for the needs of the Trust Fund and bearing interest at rates determined by the Secretary, taking into consideration current market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities. The income on such investments shall be credited to and form a part of such Trust Fund.

"(d)(1) There is imposed, on every utility which sells electricity in any State in the acid deposition impact region, an acid deposition reduction fee equal to 3.0 mil per kilowatt-hour on all electricity generated by such utility and sold after the date of the enactment of this part in any State in such region. Such fee shall be for the purpose of paying for the grants provided under subsection (a) of this section.

"(2) The fee imposed by paragraph (1) shall be collected by the person owning or operating the utility and shall be paid to the Treasury of the United States and deposited in the Acid Deposition Reduction Trust Fund.

"SECONDARY ACID DEPOSITION IMPACT REGION

"SEC. 189. (a)(1) There is established a secondary acid deposition impact region consisting of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, and South Carolina.

"(2) If the Administrator determines, based on the results of the study conducted pursuant to section 182(a), that the purposes of this part will be better served by including the group of States comprising the secondary acid deposition impact region in the acid deposition impact region established under section 181, he may include such group of States in the acid deposition impact region, effective on the date of such determination.

"(b) The provisions of this part shall apply to the States added to the acid deposition impact region by reason of subsection (a) in the same manner as such provisions apply to the States originally included in such region under section 181, except that—

"(1) all time requirements imposed under sections 183, 185, and 186 which are measured from the date of the enactment of this part, shall, with respect to such additional States, be measured instead from the date of the inclusion of such additional States;

"(2) the requirements of section 185(b)(4) shall apply to such additional States effective 18 months after the inclusion of such additional States rather than on December 31, 1985; and

"(3) the Governors of such additional States may allocate the additional 2,000,000 tons of sulfur dioxide emission reductions among such additional States in accordance with the same requirements as set forth in section 184.

"(c) If the States in the secondary acid deposition impact area are added to the acid deposition impact area by reason of subsection (a), the term '6,000,000 tons' appearing in sections 183(a) and 185(a)(1) shall thereafter be deemed to be '8,000,000 tons'.".

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, since the passage of the Clean Air Act in 1970, this country has moved a long way in a short time toward a more healthy atmosphere. But one air pollution threat so far has remained outside the scope of remedial legislation, one that is killing fish and wildlife and possibly damaging human health. I am speaking, of course, of acid rain.

Acid rain is precipitation laced with sulfuric and nitric acids. It is a fact of life, an immediate and destructive reality throughout the Northeastern United States and Southern Canada. In Wheeling, W. Va., rain has fallen that is more acidic than lemon juice.

In several hundred lakes and streams, only algae survive; steady inflows of acidic waters have killed all fish life. Fish-eating birds, such as the common loon, have also been affected. By mobilizing heavy metals in the soil, acid rain can pollute water supplies with elevated levels of toxic materials such as lead. It corrodes stone and metal on buildings and cars. It leaches nutrients from acid-sensitive soils. These are among the known effects of acid precipitation.

In addition, there is growing evidence that acid rain may interfere with crucial soil chemistry such as nitrogen fixation, damage crops, and reduce the productivity of forests.

Acid rain was not discovered in the last year or two—it just seems that way in Washington. The problem of acidifying lakes and streams has been studied in Sweden and this country since the 1950's. But a number of media accounts in 1981 and 1982 brought the issue to the forefront and resulted in the acceptance of the issue as a legitimate topic for legislative action. For the first time, a large number of legislators—myself included—were saying, "Research alone is not enough. We must start on a path of action." It was in that spirit that in October of 1981, I joined as an original cosponsor of legislation requiring a 10-million-ton reduction in sulfur dioxide emissions in the Eastern United States.

Since that time, we have remained at an impasse. Acid rain legislation failed to reach the floor of either House of Congress in 1982 and last year was not dealt with at all. Indeed, the issue has been largely responsible for blocking action on renewal of the Clean Air Act itself. When Bill Ruckelshaus took over at the Environmental Protection Agency, he made a strong commitment to acid rain legislation. But a proposal has not yet emerged.

The primary argument against legislative action on acid rain has been that the scientific evidence does not delineate clearly enough the relationship between sulfur dioxide emissions and dying fish in the Adirondack Mountains of New York. But reports by the National Academy of Sciences and by the President's Office of Science and Technology Policy have laid that argument to rest with a fair degree of certainty.

As the Academy's report put it:

> Although claims have been made that direct evidence linking power-plant emissions to the production of acid rain is inconclusive, we find the circumstantial evidence for their role overwhelming * * *. At current rates of emission of sulfur and nitrogen oxides, the number of affected lakes can be expected to more than double by 1990 and to include larger and deeper lakes. There is little probability that some factor other than emissions of sulfur and nitrogen oxides is responsible for acid rain.

Why, then, has there been no action?

The answer, very simply, is this: The framers of acid rain legislation have placed virtually all of the costs of cleanup on the industrialized States of the Midwest for a program that would largely benefit the Northeast. This is a divisive approach, pitting State against State, region against region. It is unsound policy, both politically and socially.

Mr. President, when I first became involved in this issue, I faced a number of serious, reasonable questions that had no ready answers: What is the relationship between the large amount of sulfur put into the air in Missouri and the deterioration of sensitive areas many hundreds of miles away? What would a cleanup program cost the consumer, particularly in Missouri, where utility bills have been a cause of continuing economic and political concern? What impact would a reduction on sulfur emissions have on the lakes and streams that we are seeking to help?

The uncertainty about these questions has fueled the regional debate. Let us examine them one by one.

First, what is the relative contribution of local and long-distance sources?

There is general scientific agreement that long-distance transport of sulfur emissions contributes to acid rain. What is not as clear is the range of distance involved. Commonsense tells us that particles emitted from a smokestack will fall to the ground, and closer you are to the smokestack, the more particles will fall on you. Conversely, the effect of a smokestack hundreds of miles away will be less than one 50 miles away.

As the report of the National Academy of Sciences put it, "It can be stated as rule of thumb that the farther a source is from a given receptor site, the smaller its influence on that site will be per unit mass emitted." Work done at Washington University in St. Louis suggests that sulfate emissions travel no more than 600 miles.

This presents a conundrum for a Senator from Missouri. On the one hand, Missouri contains some of the worst sulfur emitters in the country. On the other hand, none of them appears to be within 600 miles of an affected ecosystem. Should a cleanup strategy include Missouri or not?

If acid rain is essentially a regional problem, involving only the death of aquatic life in sensitive areas that lack alkaline buffers, then it follows that the solution should be a regional one. On the other hand, if we determine that the effect of acid rain on forest growth and on agriculture is significant, a national strategy may be a better option.

Second, what would be the cost of a cleanup program?

Estimates of the cost of a major reduction in sulfur emissions vary widely. Some analyses conclude benignly that such a program could be implemented with a modest increase of 2 to 5 percent on utility bills in the 31-State eastern region. But that suggests that everyone would share the cost equally, which is not necessarily the case. If each utility is responsible for the cost of cleaning up its own emissions, the costs to some could be staggering. A reasonable, even conservative, projection by Union Electric Co. in St. Louis resulted in an estimated 20-percent increase in consumer bills. Anyone who is prepared to accept that result has not discussed it with a Missouri consumer.

Other utilities have estimated even greater impacts. In some cases, the substitution of low-sulfur coal would do the job cheaper than the installation of stack gas scrubbers, but that would mean the displacement of high-sulfur coal mined in Appalachia in favor of the cleaner variety found out West. Try suggesting that to a utility in West Virginia. Indeed, the impetus toward acid rain controls jeopardizes the whole future of the high-sulfur coal industry, and with it, the economy of an entire region of the country.

Third, what would be the benefits of a cleanup program?

The White House Office of Science and Technology Policy concluded that any cutback in sulfur emissions would reduce acid deposition and "as a consequence both reduce the probability for major changes in additional acid-sensitive lakes or forests and allow the possibility for a return toward the original biological conditions existing in recently acidified areas."

Polluters emit an estimated 24 million tons of sulfur dioxide annually in the East; thus, a 12-million-ton reduction would equate to 50 percent. This, according to the National Academy of Sciences report, would result in a roughly equivalent reduction in acid deposition. An 8-million-ton reduction, as contained in S. 768, now before the Committee on Environment and Public Works, would amount to a one-third cut.

Let me suggest one caveat, however: If we concentrate on reducing powerplant emissions throughout the region, overlooking the disproportionate contribution of local sources, we risk serious disappointment. If the powerplants of Missouri are not affecting the Adirondacks, neither will a cutback aid them. The rainfall may become less acidic in Ohio—with less of Missouri's sulfur in it—but our central concern is not the rainfall in Ohio. The 50-percent reduction may translate into a cut of 20 percent or less for the smaller local sources that are doing the real damage.

So now, I have presented questions about long-distance transport, worries about the costs of a cleanup program, and uncertainties about the benefits. How should we proceed?

The White House science report provides a useful nudge:

> It is in the nature of the acid deposition problem that actions have to be taken despite incomplete knowledge * * *. If we take the conservative point of view that we must wait until the scientific knowledge is definitive, the accumulated deposition and damaged environment may reach the point of irreversibility.

In short, we know enough to act, and we should act. I believe we should initiate a program of substantial reductions in sulfur dioxide emissions, and we should do so with legislation this year.

But that brings us back to the question: How do we avoid the regional divisiveness that has plagued this issue to date?

My suggestion, which I proposed 2 years ago in S. 2594 and which I renew today in the form of amendments to S. 768, is to fine tune the approach taken in legislation so far, I am offering amendments because I do not propose to reinvent the wheel with respect to acid rain legislation. I do not purport to know whether we should reduce our sulfur dioxide emissions by 8 or 10 or 12 million tons. Instead, I am deferring to the committee's product, S. 768, in all but two particulars.

First, we should reduce the size of the region involved, to take into account the remaining questions about long-range transport of sulfates. My amendments would remove the nine Western and Southern States most distant from the areas that have suffered demonstrable damage from acid rain; these States would constitute a secondary region that could be included in the cleanup program at the discretion of the EPA Administrator.

All of the acid rain proposals to date have established a 31-State "transport corridor." The repeated use of this region in studies of acid rain has suggested a tacit scientific endorsement of the region, which endorsement in fact does not exist. I would suggest, Mr. President, that this particular emperor has no clothes. It is simply a line on a map. What rationale, for example, would include Arkansas and exclude Texas? Why must it be a straight line?

I do not claim any profound scientific basis for my proposal, either. It is simply another line on a map. But I would suggest that we must have a clearly stated rationale for the inclusion of every State in this region before we go forward. It appears clear to me that the closer a State is to the problem, the more likely it is to be contributing to the problem. To impose the profound economic consequences of this legislation on any particular State without compelling evidence of commensurate benefits would be irresponsible. If Missouri, for example, is found to be clearly contributing to ecological damage 800 miles away in the Adirondacks, fine—count us in. But as Missourians often do, first I must say, "Show me."

Second, we should spread the costs of compliance evenly throughout the region. My amendments would impose a surcharge of 3 mils per kilowatt-hour—at most a 5-percent increase in rates—on all electricity sold within the region, regardless of its source. Studies conducted by the Congressional Research Service and by the Congressional Budget Office since I proposed this approach in S. 2594 confirm that it would be sufficient to pay for a major cleanup program.

Financing the program in this way also would tend to lessen the damage done to the high-sulfur coal industry. In order to cut sulfur emissions, a utility must choose between installing stack gas scrubbers and switching to low-sulfur coal. By eliminating the need to finance the large capital cost of scrubbers, we would make that option more attractive—without going so far as to mandate it, regardless of its cost.

As a Senator from Missouri, I could never support a proposal that put all of the costs on my State for the benefit of another. If we are to solve serious and costly environmental problems like acid rain, the burden must be managed fairly, which is to say in a politically acceptable way. You could design a draconian solution that might solve the problem but would never see the light of day. We should be seeking good results without crucifying people.

There is much talk in this debate about the principle of making the polluter pay. And that is fine in principle. But where utilities are involved, it will be the consumer that pays. It is not the fault of John Doe in Columbus, Ohio, or Springfield, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo., that he is hooked up to one utility and not another. He has no choice. He did not participate in the decision to burn high- or low-sulfur coal. He did not advise on the height of the smokestack or the configuration of the boilers or the need for precipitators. And he should not be held accountable for those decisions.

Nor should we be making artificial distinctions between different sources of electricity—between coal, or oil, or gas, or nuclear. The point is to share the burden and go forward together to solve a common problem. We must not let regional divisiveness impede our progress toward that goal.

In dealing with disaster—and almost any environmental problem has the financial scope of a disaster—we must deal with the cleanup collectively, by spreading the costs around. That is the concept of catastrophic health insurance: a group of people share the costs of an individual's catastrophe. Closer to the subject at hand, it is also the concept of Superfund—a program for cleaning up hazardous waste dumps with money from the entire chemical industry.

Mr. President, the States of the Northeast want their rivers and lakes brought back to life. I am a fisherman, and I share that hope. I love to fish in Missouri, and I would love to fish in the Adirondacks, too. But let us not drive people and regions apart with finger pointing and name calling. If we are to maintain a national consensus on cleaning up the environment, let us join together as equal partners to get the job done.

As a Senator from Missouri, I want to protect my State and the other States of the Midwest from bearing an undue burden. As one of 100 Members of the Senate, I want to see action on acid rain. The time to get started is now.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

SOCIAL SECURITY AND THE DEFICIT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, just over 1 year ago, the National Commission on Social Security Reform, on which I served, developed a series of proposals to insure the short- and long-term financial solvency of the social security system. I am pleased to report that reforms embodied in the Social Security Reform Act of 1983 (Public Law 98-21), which closely followed the Commission's proposals, did just that.

Dr. Martin S. Feldstein, Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisors, confirmed this report in remarks last November to the Southern Economics Association, noting that after 1984, the separately financed social security program will not contribute to the $200 billion Federal deficits.

In spite of this fact, many continue to suggest cuts in social security benefits to reduce Federal deficits. Not only is this unjustified as a matter of sensible budget policy, it is unfair to social security beneficiaries. Cut back social security in such desperation, and you will abandon a solemn promise of American society.

Robert M. Ball, the distinguished Social Security Commissioner under three Presidents and a member of the National Commission on Social Security Reform, understands the folly and fallacy of looking to social security for budget reductions. Last November 9, he testified before the House Budget Committee's Task Force on Entitlements, Uncontrollables and Indexing, and said: "You start whittling away at social security and you put more and more people into poverty. Social security serves low-income people and those who would be low-income people if it weren't for social security."

Mr. Ball also explained eloquently the real dangers of reducing the purchasing power of social security benefits, a proposal that has become quite fashionable of late. He notes that a 10-percent reduction in social security's purchasing power would be borne disproportionately by those with incomes below the poverty line or less than 125 percent of poverty levels. The poverty gap for the elderly, he calculates, would be increased by over $1 billion.

Mr. President, I often have suggested that everyone is entitled to his own opinion, but not to his own facts. Mr. Ball has the facts. I urge my colleagues to take note of Mr. Ball's facts, as they form their own opinions about the deficit. I assure you I already have. I ask that the articles previously mentioned be printed in full in the RECORD.

The articles referred to follow:

THE GOVERNORS, SOCIAL SECURITY AND THE DEFICIT

The four governors signing the piece on the budget deficit [Outlook, Jan. 22] seemed to have missed the Report of the National Commission on Social Security Reform a year ago and the subsequent 1983 amendments to the Social Security Act. They are right about the need to reduce the budget deficit, but cutting Social Security benefits has no place in the solution. From 1985 on, the self-financed system of Social Security will not contribute one cent to the deficit, and according to the best estimate available there is no long-range deficit in Social Security.

Two of the three proposals the governors offer for cutting back on Social Security are already part of the law (although in slightly different form) as the result of the 1983 amendments. The age of first eligibility for retirement benefits will rise gradually beginning in the year 2000, and starting with the current tax year, half the Social Security benefits of higher-income recipients will be taxed.

Social Security has been put into both short-term and long-term financial balance by last year's amendments. If benefits were to be reduced further, as these governors suggest, by cutting back on the cost-of-living increase, financing should also be reduced and then the budget deficit would be unaffected. The losers would be Social Security beneficiaries now and in the future.

Medicare is a different story. Strong cost-control measures are needed for the entire U.S. health-care system, including Medicare; but the old-age, survivors' and disability insurance program is now in good shape financially and should be left alone.

ROBERT M. BALL.

WASHINGTON. (The writer, a member of the National Commission on Social Security Reform, was Social Security commissioner from 1962 to 1973.)

THE FULL COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT SHOULD BE PAID TO SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFICIARIES

(Testimony before the Budget Committee Task Force on Entitlements, Uncontrollables and Indexing by Robert M. Ball, Wednesday, Nov. 9, 1983)

MR. CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS OF THE TASK FORCE: My name is Robert Ball. From April 1962 until March 1973 I was Commissioner of Social Security, serving under Presidents Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon. Prior to becoming Commissioner, I served for approximately 20 years in various positions in the Social Security Administration and its predecessor organization, the Social Security Board, and for the ten years prior to becoming Commissioner I was the top civil servant in the Social Security organization. Since leaving the government, I have continued my deep interest in programs benefitting the elderly and have written and lectured extensively on the subject. I am currently a Visting Scholar at the Center for the Study of Social Policy and Senior Consultant to the Study Group on Social Security.

I was a member of the National Commission on Social Security Reform whose report formed the basis for the social security legislation that was signed into law by the President on April 20, 1983. I am testifying today as an individual, and the views expressed are not necessarily those of any organization with which I am associated.

I believe it would be unwise to pay only part of the cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) to social security beneficiaries as proposed in H.R. 3790 and in the deficit reduction plans now being considered in the Senate Finance Committee. I believe this for several reasons.

1. Reduction in the COLA Would Break the Agreement Implicit in the 1983 Amendments and Will Be Considered Unfair. All during 1981 and 1982, social security beneficiaries—36 million people, principally elderly retired persons, totally disabled people, widows, and motherless and fatherless children—were terrorized by the fear that their benefits would stop or be reduced. There were almost daily reports of social security "bankruptcy." Under this daily pounding, a high proportion of the 116 million contributors to the program became convinced that they would never receive the benefits toward which they were contributing. The nation was greatly disturbed by the possibility that the government might turn its back on the commitments it had made over the last 50 years. The 1983 Amendments to the Social Security Act have restored fiscal solvency to social security and have reassured people that their benefits are safe. I do not believe that we should again be dealing with the subject of benefit cuts.

After a year of study, the National Commission on Social Security Reform, appointed jointly by the President and the Republican and Democratic leadership of the Congress, presented a set of recommendations which were endorsed by 12 of its 15 members. These recommendations became the basis for the 1983 amendments to the Social Security Act.

The recommendations had the support of the President and the Speaker of the House, the majority leaders of both the House and the Senate, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Chairman of that Committee's Subcommittee on Social Security, the Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and a broad range of support within the Congress and without. For example, when the plan was introduced in the Senate by Senator Dole as S.1, it had as initial sponsors both Senator Laxalt and Senator Kennedy. Outside groups supporting the plan included the National Association of Manufacturers, the Business Roundtable, and the AFL-CIO.

No one who supported the plan liked all parts of it. There was some pain for everyone involved in social security, but not too much for any one group:

Beneficiaries had the cost-of-living adjustment postponed and put permanently on a calendar year basis, a move which amounted to approximately a 2 percent benefit cut over the average beneficiary's lifetime.

Contribution rate increases were speeded up for both workers and employers, with employers paying more than under previous law in 1984, 1988, and 1989 and employees paying more in 1988 and 1989.

The self-employed will be required to pay social security rates in the future that are comparable to what is paid by and on behalf of employees, a considerable increase over what they had been paying in the past.

Higher-income social security beneficiaries (about 10% of all beneficiaries) will for the first time pay an income tax on one-half their social security benefits, with the proceeds of the tax going to support social security.

Those non-profit employees not previously covered (about 15% of the total) and newly hired Federal employees will be brought under the system, together with members of Congress and top officials of the Executive Branch.

The Federal government speeded up its payment for military service credits and will pay for the refundable tax credit for employees in the year 1984 and for certain tax credits for the self-employed.

The 1983 amendments were designed to bring the separately-financed OASDI system into balance. There was an agreement struck among many diverse interests as to how to do this. To now impose additional sacrifice on one group—beneficiaries—is a violation of that agreement. Millions of people will consider such a move unfair. Social security would once again become a major unsettling factor in our national life and on the political scene.

2. The Separately Financed Social Security Program Will Not Contribute to the Deficit after 1984 and Should Not Be Used to Reduce Deficits Caused by Either too Much Spending or Inadequate Income in Other Programs. The recommendations of the National Commission improved the financing of the program by an estimated $169 billion between now and 1990, solving the short-term financing problem of the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance system (OASDI), and the same proposals solved about two-thirds of the long-range financing problem as projected by the more conservative of the two central sets of projections out of the four made by the trustees of the social security program. The Congress adopted an additional provision—increasing the age of first eligibility for full benefits which takes effect gradually after the year 2000. This provision was not recommended by the whole Commission, but was advocated by some members. As a result of all these changes, in all probability OASDI is now adequately financed for both the short run and over the 75 years for which the long-range estimates are made. The long-range cost of OASDI shown as a percent of payroll was reduced by 1.25 percentage points between the 1982 Trustees' Report and the 1983 Report—from 14.09 percent to 12.84 percent. The income to the system was increased 0.60 percentage points—from 12.27 percent to 12.87 percent, putting the system into approximate actuarial balance, +.02 percent of payroll.

There can, of course, be no absolute guarantee that experience will follow any particular set of estimates. From 1984 through 1987, the system is in rather close balance, although the financing is adequate under all four sets of estimates the trustees have made. Beginning in 1988 and running to 2020, OASDI is projected to build very large surpluses under three of the projections and is adequately financed during this period under even the most pessimistic assumptions used. After 2020, under all but the most pessimistic projections, the trust funds still continue to rise for a long period of time because of interest earnings on the large reserve, but they start to drop somewhat when measured as a percentage of the next year's outgo. All in all, the 1983 amendments have produced adequate financing for the next 75 years under three sets of assumptions and for 50 years under the most pessimistic. Failure to keep social security benefits up to date with purchasing power would be particularly resented because OASDI is now adequately financed, and the benefit reduction clearly would be made for the purpose of reducing the overall deficit.

3. Keeping Benefits Up to Date with the Cost of Living Makes Sense. Since the amendments of 1972, the purchasing power of social security benefits has been protected against inflation. The provision was adopted as a conservative measure because its sponsors believed that an automatic provision for meeting increases in the cost of living would tend to prevent ad hoc benefit increases and other expensive changes in the program that went beyond keeping the benefits up to date with price changes. It has turned out to be one of the most valuable provisions in the social security program.

It seems to me to make complete sense to decide on the proper level of benefits that people should get at the time of first receipt and then to maintain the purchasing power of that benefit. It does not seem to me to make sense to pay a benefit that is worth more at the beginning of a period of retirement, say, than it is worth five or ten years later. If we cannot afford to maintain a benefit in real terms—and I have no doubt but that we can—then we should pay lower amounts in the beginning and maintain those lower amounts in real terms.

4. Modifying Social Security Commitments in Ways Unrelated to Social Security Purposes Undermines Faith in the Program. Social security promises rest on past earnings and contributions and stretch into the distant future. Workers today are paying for protection that in part will not be realized for 20, 30 or 40 years in the future. To modify benefit promises in ways unrelated to social security needs or purposes would further weaken faith in the system, and, indeed, in the promises of government generally.

5. Failure to Maintain the Purchasing Power of Social Security Benefits Falls with Particular Harshness on Low-Income People. There is a mistaken notion—that has recently gained some currency—that social security, because it has no needs test, is somehow a "middle-class" program. Social security is a universal program and is largely responsible for the fact that those over 65, as a group, are now no more likely to be desperately poor than younger people.

If there were no social security and no other income took its place, there would be about 3.5 elderly poor persons for every one now below the poverty level. Social security cuts the incidence of poverty among the elderly by 71 percent. Nine to 10 million people above 65 are kept above the rock-bottom poverty level by social security, and 4 to 5 million other social security beneficiaries are also kept above the poverty level by their social security benefits. Millions more are kept just above the poverty level by social security. Whittling away at social security benefits will reverse the progress we have made and plunge additional people into the poor and near-poor category.

Cutting the purchasing power of social security benefits by 2 percent a year for six years, as in H.R. 3790, or by 3 percent a year for three years, as in the proposal now being considered in the Senate Finance Committee, is the equivalent of a 12 percent and 9 percent benefit cut, respectively, for those receiving benefits in the years in question. Below I have summarized some of the effects of reducing social security purchasing power by approximately 10 percent.

(a) Nearly 20 percent of the reduction would be borne by people either below the poverty level ($4,626 per year for a single person over 65 and $5,836 for an elderly couple in 1982) or with incomes less than 125 percent of the poverty level. Some of this, perhaps a fourth, would be made up for by additional payments from Supplemental Security Income (SSI).

(b) The poverty gap for the elderly—the difference between poor peoples' income and the Census Bureau's definition of poverty—would be increased by over $1 billion.

(c) The number of elderly poor would be increased by 700,000 and the number of near-poor elderly (125 percent of the poverty level) by 400,000.

6. Reducing the Cost-of-Living Adjustment over a Specified Period of Time Introduces Unfair Treatment Among Beneficiaries. Those who are receiving benefits throughout the whole period of reduction will get 12 percent less in benefits under H.R. 3790 than under present law. On the other hand, those who apply first after 1990 will receive full benefits, unless, as many will fear, the reduction provision is extended.

7. Taking into Account Inflation Rates in Excess of the Same Percentage in Income Tax Indexing and in Benefit Indexing Has Only a Superficial Appearance of Equity. The fact that there are more taxpayers than beneficiaries means that the two measures contribute about the same amount to deficit reductions, but the effect on individuals is very different. Under H.R. 3790, the purchasing power of benefits is reduced by 12 percent for those on the rolls from 1985 through 1990. The change in indexing the income tax has much less effect on the after-tax income of taxpayers.

If the social security COLA is set at the CPI minus 3 percent, as in the plans being considered by the Senate Finance Committee, the result is a 3 percent a year across-the-board reduction in benefits. After two years, benefits would be 6 percent lower than they would have been if the COLA had been for the full increase in the CPI. For a household which depends on social security as a sole source of income, two years of CPI minus 3 percent results in a 6 percent reduction in income. One in five elderly households depends on social security for at least 80 percent of total income.

If income is half social security and half other income, this would amount to a 3 percent reduction in income. More than half of all elderly recipients derive more than 50 percent of their income from social security.

Reducing tax indexing does not increase taxes by a flat percent across the board. Indexing expands the amount of income that falls into each tax bracket to prevent inflation from forcing taxpayers into higher tax brackets. As a result of indexing minus 3, brackets would not be expanded to accommodate the first 3 percent of inflation. The actual reduction in after-tax income varies. A family filing a joint return with two dependents and earning $30,000 would experience a 0.3 percent reduction in after-tax income for the year 1985. The same family earning $50,000 would experience a 0.4 percent reduction in after-tax income. But in no case will the reduction in after-tax income be nearly as large as the social security cuts.

The attached table shows the effect in 1985 of reducing tax indexing by 3 percentage points on after-tax income for taxpayer units of varying family size and income. The percentages in the last column are to be compared with a straight 3 percent reduction in social security benefits.

CONCLUSION

I am very sympathetic to the goal of bringing down the deficits projected in the general budget, but I do not believe that further cuts in social security benefits are an appropriate part of this effort. Surely there are measures to accomplish the desired objective which would be fairer and which would not reopen the social security issue.

S. 2001—THE NATIONAL ACID DEPOSITION REDUCTION ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to express my support for and cosponsorship of S. 2001, the National Acid Deposition Reduction Act, introduced by my distinguished colleague from Minnesota, Senator DURENBERGER.

Acid rain is corroding both the environment and the economy throughout the country. It is a particularly serious problem for the State of New York. In the Adirondack Park, 212 lakes are now "dead"—barren of fish—because of acid rain. More than 250 other Adirondack lakes are on the brink. This harm to natural beauty and ecological balance is bad enough in its own right, but the damage to the sportfishing industry puts thousands of jobs at risk.

Acid rain is destroying our forests and eating away at our buildings and monuments. It has even scarred the Statute of Liberty. Mr. President, this acid siege has to end.

The legislation I am cosponsoring today aims at a 10-million-ton net reduction in acid deposition in the 31 States east of or bordering on the Mississippi River. The bill includes a financing mechanism. The reductions will be achieved through buying control technology with revenues from an emissions tax imposed on sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide. The tax will raise $40 billion over 10 years. The revenue will go to a trust fund that EPA will use to help utilities and factories with the capital cost and operating expenses of the necessary technology.

The bill is effective. A 10-million-ton reduction should go a long way toward making rainfall less acidic.

The bill is fair. By basing revenues on emissions, it acknowledges that some States have made progress in curbing sulfur dioxide. But by spreading the cost nationwide, it also keeps any one State from bearing an excessive burden.

The bill is prudent. It does not arbitrarily mandate any particular control method. In choosing where to invest money from the trust fund, EPA ought to have the flexibility to consider which methods promise the greatest benefit for every dollar spent.

In some instances, the most reasonable method might consist of switching to low-sulfur coal. But this might raise problems for States that produce high-sulfur coal. Like Senator DURENBERGER, I invite my colleagues from those States to look at this bill. I welcome suggestions as to how we might take account of the needs of coal mining areas.

Mr. President, we should not let this issue pit region against region. We all live under the same sky, but we must lesson the amount of acid rain falling on our heads.●

SENATOR PELL'S REMARKS ON FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR THE ARTS

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, in 1981, I was fortunate to become chairman of the Senate Education, Arts, and Humanities Subcommittee which has jurisdiction over our important Federal education, arts, and humanities programs. I have greatly enjoyed my work in this area in the last 3 years, and I know that one of the main reasons I have has been that Senator CLAIBORNE PELL has remained as the ranking minority member of the subcommittee after serving very ably as its chairman for many years. And, in the area of the arts and humanities, he has remained the Senate's leader and expert, a distinction he earned many years ago as one of the founding fathers of the Arts and Humanities Endowments.

Last month Senator PELL wrote an article for the Annals, a journal published by the American Academy of Political and Social Science, in which he discusses the future of Federal support for the arts. I commend Senator

PELL's comments on these important issues to all of my colleagues in the Senate, particularly his remarks on the importance of private-public sector cooperation in support of the arts, and I look forward to working with him when the Senate begins its reauthorization of the Arts and Humanities Endowments.

The comments follow:

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR THE ARTS HAS A FUTURE

(By Claiborne deB. Pell)

Abstract: As one who has been intimately involved for 23 years with the federal programs that support the arts in this country, I have been particularly concerned about recent Reagan administration efforts to reduce the budgets of the National Endowments for the Arts and for the Humanities and to lessen their impact on our cultural scene. The administration's approach to federal arts policy began with some basic misconceptions about the sources of the impressive growth that took place in the sixties and seventies in both the number and quality of American cultural institutions. Moreover the administration contended that as government support for the arts increased, there was a decrease in moneys from the private sector. Statistics seem to indicate that the opposite is true. The federal government through the National Endowment for the Arts has had a major impact in aiding and expanding our nation's cultural institutions. Much of this effect has been achieved in partnership with private resources. This critical government role as catalyst and facilitator must continue to spark increased nonfederal support for the arts.

The direction of federal support for the arts became alarmingly uncertain only a few weeks into the Reagan administration. The drastic reductions proposed for the 1982 fiscal year came as a surprise to those of us in the Congress who had nurtured the steady growth of our twin Arts and Humanities Endowments over the preceding fifteen years, growth that had enjoyed the unique bipartisan support and encouragement of presidents and congressmen alike.

THE THREAT TO FEDERAL SUPPORT

The administration proposal was to reduce the budget authority of the National Endowments for the Arts and for the Humanities by half. A "savings" of 50 percent was foreseen in the programs beginning in the fiscal year 1982. Furthermore, it was recommended at the same time that budgets for the fiscal years 1984 and 1985 be held at the $100 million level.

The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) under the guidance of its director, David Stockman, stated its rationale for these cuts as follows:

Reductions of this magnitude are premised on the notion that the Administration should completely revamp federal policy for arts and humanities support. For too long, the Endowments have spread federal financing into an ever-wider range of artistic and literary endeavor, promoting the notion that the federal government should be the financial patron of first resort for both individuals and institutions engaged in artistic and literary pursuits. This policy has resulted in a reduction in the historic role of private, individual, and corporate support in these key areas. These reductions in federal support are a first step toward reversing this trend.[1]

The most extreme interpretation of these words would be that government does not really have an obligation to support the arts financially or philosophically and should therefore stop or drastically curtail its activity in this area. Others, of a more moderate bent, would hold that government support should extend only to our so-called national treasures, leaving the rest of our artists and cultural institutions to fend for themselves. However one interpreted the OMB rationale, it was a startlingly new concept, which posed serious social and economic consequences for a multitude of communities and institutions.

Mr. Stockman advised the president that such cuts "could generate strong opposition" from the Endowment's "broad and articulate public constituencies."[2] Despite this warning, however, he proceeded to recommend the 50 percent reductions. Some members of the administration tried to put the best face possible on the proposed halving of the Arts Endowment's budget by spreading the word that Stockman had originally asked for the complete elimination of the agency. This generous gesture, if true, was hardly reassuring to the arts community and to their supporters in Congress. With the formal submission of the proposed budget revisions, the battle of the budget was officially under way.

I particularly objected at the time to two of OMB's justifications for the reductions. First, I strongly disagreed with the point that the arts were a "low priority item,"[3] and second, I took issue with the contention that federal support for the arts over the previous 15 years had discouraged or driven out private and corporate support. In fact, in the 10 years prior to the Arts Endowment's establishment, contributions to the arts from the private sector had risen less than 3 percent from an estimated $199 million in 1955, to $205 million in 1964. In the succeeding years, however, when the Endowment has been performing its crucial role as a catalyst, total philanthropic support for the arts and culture had grown to $2.7 billion and corporate support alone had increased from $22 million in 1966 to $435 million currently.

Since its beginning in 1965, the Endowment has also been largely responsible for encouraging growth in support for the arts from state governments, in local arts agency support, in the overall increase in the number of arts institutions, and especially in the size of audiences.

Perhaps the most fundamental concept of my original enabling legislation was that private initiative should always be the principal and primary source for the support and encouragement of the arts in the United States. I envisioned the Endowment as a catalyst that would help spark nonfederal support for the arts in a new and unique role for public moneys. The fact that Endowment grants were to be matched on a one-to-one basis was the key to the entire proposal.

After seeing the success of this plan, the legislation was later amended to provide for the Challenge and Treasury Department grants, which required a match of three nonfederal dollars for each federal dollar granted by the Endowment. I could not have been more pleased when the incoming private dollars began far exceeding those required by the federal guidelines. The concept of "Endowment as catalyst" was clearly working, and it was proving to be of tremendously important assistance to cultural institutions.

IN DEFENSE OF FEDERAL SUPPORT

When the appropriations hearings got under way to address the cuts in the first Reagan budget, the arts community turned out in impressive numbers and with eloquent pleadings and telling statistics with which to make their case. These articulate arts witnesses were supported by representatives from the corporate sector, who were justifiably worried that massive reductions by the government would send a signal that the arts were in fact dispensable. If this belief took hold it would certainly not encourage the private sector to contribute additional sums at a time when they were actually of critical importance.

After lengthy hearings and complicated negotiations between the House of Representatives and the Senate, a final budget of $143 million was approved for the Arts Endowment in fiscal year 1982—approximately a 10-percent reduction from the year before but in reality a more serious blow, owing to the toll taken by inflation. The important element, however, was that the arts constituency in this country had proven to be a powerful force with which Congress and the president could not avoid dealing. Indeed the strength and effectiveness of the outcry may have surprised the administration and convinced it that further major alterations in federal arts policy should be undertaken more cautiously and with an eye to the freshly mobilized and confident arts constituency.

The administration soon responded by appointing the Presidential Task Force on the Arts and Humanities and directed it to conduct a thorough reassessment of federal arts policy. Many who feared that there would be fundamental alterations in the Endowment's structure and purpose were reassured when President Reagan called our cultural institutions "an essential national resource" that "must be kept strong"[4] despite the need to reduce government spending. Others were suspicious that the task force findings were already a foregone conclusion and that the Arts and Humanities Endowments, as we know them, were to be drastically transformed into a government corporation along the lines of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Nevertheless a distinguished group of citizens from the artistic, corporate, and university worlds was appointed by the president to conduct an extensive review of both Endowments. An indication of the future of federal support for the arts can be found in the report that the task force presented at its final meeting. First, it concluded to everyone's great relief that there is indeed a valuable federal role in the arts and humanities. The low priority assigned to the arts by OMB had clearly undergone an important alteration. In addition the task force found the basic structure of the two Endowments to be sound. I particularly welcomed this finding, as my confidence in the two agencies and the way they operate has remained steadfast over their entire life span.

Those of us on the Senate authorizing subcommittee exercise our oversight authority by setting the direction of the Endowment's programs. Reauthorization of the Endowments, which now occurs every four or five years, gives us the chance to address specific problems in a program and to hear proposals for change. Some fine tuning has been carried out over the years, but, in general, the original legislation has remained largely unchanged as a testament to its effectiveness as well as to the success of the Endowments.

A further finding of the task force was that support for the arts from the private sector should be increased. The success of the Challenge Grant Program was undoubtedly a guidepost here. But the task force recommendation went further to ask that corporate, foundation, and individual giving be increased so as to make up the shortfall in federal spending. It was speculated at the time that if any one of the top 500 corporations gave the legally allowable 5 percent contribution to the arts, the funding problem would be solved. Furthermore only 30 percent of the nation's corporations were said to be making charitable donations, and that a great deal more could be accomplished if these vast untapped resources were mobilized.

Though business will undoubtedly find it difficult to increase its gifts in the present economic climate, I wish to encourage all efforts in this direction. The Arts Endowment has a superb track record of being able to attract private money. Through the existing mechanism of Treasury Funds and Challenge Grants, the agency is set up to receive gifts that have the wonderful effect of doubling or tripling the funds that it can actually award to a particular applicant institution. This ability to attract private money has been incorporated into the Endowment's structure ano has already proved to be a huge success. With skillful direction and encouragement, the much needed increase in private support can be achieved by expanding this partnership.

THE NEED FOR FEDERAL INVOLVEMENT

Of course a period of dramatic economic growth would help everyone, but I am skeptical that a major recovery is coming soon. Private philanthropy alone is simply not going to fill the gaps that are now occurring with alarming frequency among our arts institutions. Foundations, also pressed by economic conditions, are finding it virtually impossible to increase their giving commitments. It is regrettable but true that corporate and foundation philanthropy can only in rare instances address base budget problems no matter how sincere the interest. Some redirection of foundation funds can be expected to assist in some of the most desperate situations, but this sector cannot possibly be expected to come to the rescue without an assist from the federal government.

Large capital endowments can provide a welcome cushion in hard times, but even our major cultural institutions are just beginning to seek funds for stockpiling in such a reserve. Wisely, the Endowment's Challenge Grant Program permits both the federal and private matching moneys to be used for building such cash reserve funds. Again, it would seem prudent to explore ways of developing and improving this now well-tested method of raising capital funds. It should also be structured so that institutions of all sizes can particpate.

Though each segment of the private sector must be approached and encouraged to assist in ever more creative ways, I want to stress that I believe that the American government should very definitely continue to be actively involved in the business of the arts. I do not agree with some who see the foundations and corporations being forced into taking over programs that the government is abandoning. They have neither the resources nor the desire to do this. The government must continue to play its crucial role as catalyst and ensure that the symbiotic relationship between public funding and private initiatives remains a vital one.

The arts in this country are flourishing as never before, and their audience is expanding. It is, in fact, not the arts that are financially threatened, but only specific arts institutions and activities. Now that the structure and methods of the Arts Endowment have been endorsed by this administration, the only real gap is the gap caused by high inflation and reductions in government support. New ways can be found to increase the participation of the private sector by expanding its partnership with the establish government arts programs.●

REDUCING EUROPEAN ANXIETY

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, despite recent claims that the North Atlantic Alliance has never been stronger, there is ample evidence of fissures just beneath the surface. Western Europeans continue to question many aspects of current U.S. foreign policy, just as they disagree among themselves on many economic and security questions.

The fact that some new neclear missiles have successfully been deployed is no guarantee that the remaining weapons will be welcomed, especially absent any real progress toward arms control.

One of the most perceptive analysts of European affairs, Prof. Stanley Hoffmann of Harvard, writes in the February 6 New York Times that the United States could help reduce European anxieties by a more active and comprehensive East-West diplomacy, especially in the realm of arms control. He also suggests greater European efforts to strengthen their nonnuclear military capabilities.

Mr. President, I ask that Professor Hoffmann's cogent article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 6, 1984]

TO REDUCE EUROPEANS' ANXIETY

(By Stanley Hoffman)

PARIS.—The crisis provoked in Western Europe by the deployment of medium-range American missiles appears to have been overcome. The peace movement, particularly in West Germany, shows signs of demoralization and splintering. The governments of the major Western European countries have reaffirmed their solidarity with the United States. Nevertheless, the alliance remains in a paradoxical situation: Its European members are full of deep anxieties and wish to assert their common identity, and yet wisdom suggests a series of small steps rather than any grand design.

The anxiety is close to the surface. The very duration of the missile deployments guarantees further troubles, especially if arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union do not resume. The usual doubts about United States policy are as sharp as ever. All Western European governments believe that peace in Europe is not just a question of military equilibrium but also requires constant conversations and understandings with the Kremlin. They are not convinced that American statesmen agree, despite the recent and abrupt moderation of President Reagan's rhetoric. Many Western Europeans fear that, despite official American denials, American strategic planning entails the possibility of a "limited" nuclear war that could spare the superpowers but would devastate Europe. They are even more upset by American attacks, coming from neo-conservatives as well as from former officials of the 1960's, against the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's traditional strategy of threatening the Soviet Union with a first use nuclear weapons in the event of a Soviet conventional attack.

Western Europeans resist America's pressure to rely primarily, both for deterrence and for defense, on conventional forces, not only for economic reasons but also because they remember that conventional deterrents rarely have succeeded in the past and because they are more convinced that many Americans of the inevitable superiority of Soviet conventional forces.

Finally, Western Europeans are disturbed by recurrent United States threats or hints about removing some of America's conventional forces from Europe either in order to lighten the financial burden on the United States or to cope with more serious threats in other parts of the world.

All these possibilities emphasize Western Europe's dependence on the United States. Even the newly deployed missiles teach the same lesson. They remain under Washington's control—and the more Americans stress the declining credibility of a threat of first use, the less can Western Europeans be sure that these missiles actually will play the deterrent role for which they were deployed.

The Western Europeans are also, as usual, divided. The French have a national consensus around nuclear deterrence and often talk as if the accumulation, by the West, of nuclear weapons—any nuclear weapons—is the key to peace and security in Europe. In West Germany, on the contrary, the development both by the Soviet Union and by the United States of nuclear weapons capable of hitting the enemy's nuclear forces has awakened doubts about the long-term stability of nuclear deterrence.

These fears and disagreements have made Western European statesmen eager to revive the dormant ideal of a more autonomous Western European defense within the alliance. There is another reason: The European Economic Community is bogged down in petty discussions about money and milk, its institutions are paralyzed and all its members feel the need to take some initiative proving that the ideal of a united Europe is not dead. But there remain formidable obstacles to a common defense, especially in the nuclear field.

The modernization of the French and British nuclear deterrents will add many warheads, but they remain national forces whose capacity to deter Soviet attacks, especially conventional ones, on the rest of Europe is dubious. The French realize that their nuclear force could probably not save them from Soviet conventional attacks or blackmail should the Soviet Union reach France's borders, and that France has a vested interest in preventing a North Atlantic Treaty Organization defeat east of the Rhine. But they continue to give priority to nuclear weapons over conventional forces. The creation of a common nuclear deterrent for Western Europe would require not only a dramatic French shift from national independence to collective decision-making but also a willingness to let Bonn have not just the right of veto but a finger on the nuclear trigger. No Western European government, and especially not the West German one, is ready for this.

What is to be done? On the Western European side, there could be joint French, British and West German discussions on the uses of the French and British long-range nuclear forces, and French-German discussions on the targeting of France's tactical nuclear weapons and on the function of the quick deployment force that France plans to create. Better coordination and division of labor in the production of conventional weapons by Western Europe should certainly be undertaken.

But the two pillars of the alliance remain a joint policy toward the Soviet Union and a strategy based both on a credible conventional force and on the continuing risk of nuclear escalation in case of conventional war. The preservation of these pillars requires a greater United States willingness to match the buildup of American strength with far more active and comprehensive East-West diplomacy, especially in the realm of arms control. It also requires the persistence of uncertainty about the use of nuclear weapons in case of a Soviet conventional attack, precisely because there are no technological panaceas that could guarantee the success of a purely conventional deterrence and defense.

In the conventional-war realm, the Western European members ought to increase their efforts in order to foreclose any possibility of a quick Soviet victory. But it would be foolish to expect such an increase as long as the American economic recovery has not spread to Western Europe.

Ultimately, economic ill health and political divergences remain far more dangerous for the alliance than Soviet buildups or peace offenses.●

ARIZONA MEMORIAL SEEKS RENEWED DIPLOMATIC TIES WITH REPUBLIC OF CHINA

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, it is my great pleasure to announce that the Arizona State Legislature has overwhelmingly passed a concurrent memorial urging the President to reestablish official governmental relations with the Republic of China. Moreover, the State memorial urges Congress to take all necessary steps to fulfill U.S. commitments to the people and Government of the Republic of China.

Mr. President, I have previously called for what I call the derecognition of Red China and the resumption of our previous official recognition given to the Republic of China as the only legitimate government of the Chinese people. The memorial adopted by the legislature of my State reinforces my feeling that President Reagan should adopt this course.

The Communist regime on the mainland of China will not be here forever. The form of totalitarianism and state socialism practiced by Communist China is a proven failure. Sooner or later, communism will disintegrate from its own corruption and internal contradictions.

The Chinese, with their thousands of years of civilization, know better than anyone else of the cycles in history. Always in the past, the Chinese people have thrown off repressive regimes and have subsequently enjoyed greater heights of achievement and economic and military strength. So it was when the tyrannical Ch'in dynasty was replaced by the great Han China and so it will occur again when the Communist emperors are destroyed or destroy themselves and are succeeded by a free and constitutionally based government.

Rather than bow to the arbitrary demands of Red China, the United States should concentrate on improving its strategic relationships with proven, modern allies, such as Japan, South Korea, Taiwan and the private enterprise nations of ASEAN. Red China is not and can never be a dependable ally or partner of the democratic and free market nations of the world.

Mr. President, in restructuring our foreign policy in the Pacific, I also would urge the President and Congress to follow the recommendation made in the Arizona memorial to give U.S. security guarantees for the Republic of China. Regardless of blind or wishful thinking about the motives of Red China, the fact is that the Republic of China on Taiwan faces serious threats of blockade or invasion of the offshore islands of Kinmen and Matsu, a possible Communist naval blockade of Taiwan itself and the overwhelming of Taiwan's air and naval defenses by the growing sophisticated arms of Red China, especially if Taiwan is not allowed to obtain qualitatively advanced air defense capabilities.

Mr. President, I hope that the Arizona State memorial will encourage other States to adopt similar resolutions reflecting the real wishes of the American people, whose commonsense and loyalty to friends would be useful qualities in our foreign policy.

The memorial follows:

HOUSE CONCURRENT MEMORIAL 2001

To the President and the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

Whereas, the Republic of China has been and continues to be one of the most faithful allies of the United States since its founding in 1912, having militarily and politically supported our country during World War I, World War II, the Korean War and the Vietnam War; and

Whereas, the Republic of China has built a successful, prosperous and free economy out of the ashes of a half century of revolution, invasion and civil war and now serves as a major trading partner of the United States; and

Whereas, the Republic of China holds a pivotal, strategic position in the defense of East Asia and the Western Pacific, which is vitally important to the interest and the defense of the United States, with extensive air and naval base systems available to the United States on request, and has always utilized its military power in the interests of the free world; and

Whereas, the political and economic stability of the Republic of China and the freedom way of life, high standard of living and fundamental human rights of its 18 million people, and the military security of this nation, would be significantly enhanced by the reestablishment of official diplomatic and military relations between the Republic of China and the United States.

Wherefore your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, the Senate concurring, prays:

1. That the President of the United States reestablish official governmental relations with the Republic of China and that the Congress of the United States take all necessary actions to provide specific security guarantees for the Republic of China.

2. That the Secretary of State of the State of Arizona transmit copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Member of the Congress of the United States.

3. That the Secretary of State of the State of Arizona transmit copies of this Memorial, in care of George Y. Yeh, Arizona Coordinator for the Republic of China, to President Chiang Ching-kuo, Republic of China; Premier Sun Yun-suan, Republic of China; Minister Fu-sung Chu, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Republic of China; Minister Kuo-hwa Yu, Chairman of the Council for Economic Planning and Development, Republic of China; Minister Chao Uao-tung, Ministry of Economic Affairs, Republic of China; Minister Hsu Li-teh, Ministry of Finance, Republic of China; Minister Mo Sung-nien, Overseas Chinese Affairs Commission, Republic of China, and Representative Fredrick F. Chien, Coordination Council for North American Affairs.●

GRENADA

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, the recent rescue mission on the Marxist island of Grenada continues to provoke controversy within the American media. Despite overwhelming evidence of massive support by the American people, the media has made every effort to discredit and embarass the administration, the U.S. Armed Forces, and those involved in the mission. This tendency on the part of our media to arrogate to themselves the right to determine what the nature and direction of the United States shall be is ably analyzed in a column by the distinguished journalist, Alice Widener, and I ask that the column be printed in its entirety.

The article follows:

THE MASS MEDIA OUR OVERPRIVILEGED ELITE

(By Alice Widener)

When Vice Admiral Joseph Metcalf III barred the press from covering the United States military rescue of Grenada from anarchy, October 25 and 26, 1983, most of our mass media stars, male and female, were so infuriated they bared fangs usually concealed behind smiles artfully constructed for TV-camera close-ups by high-priced cosmetic dentistry.

Hysterically, Helen Thomas of United Press International shrieked, "The White House has lost credibility with the media."

Dan Rathers of CBS-TV said, "If the press isn't there, the people aren't there." John Chancellor of NBC-TV said, "The American government is doing whatever it wants to in Grenada without any representative of the American public watching what it's doing."

Obviously, Messrs. Rather and Chancellor exclude civilian and military officials of our Government as legitimate representatives of the American people. Fortunately for truth, at the moment of the Grenada crisis, Ray Briem of ABC Talk Radio pointed out coolly and correctly, "The polls show overwhelmingly that the media have lost credibility with the public."

Most media stars were not only way out of touch with the fundamental feelings of the very public whom they profess to protect and respect but also exhibited the kind of conceited fascistic arrogance characteristic of a republic at its time of true crisis when a single group claims immunity from discipline, tradition, loyalty and law.

What happened in Grenada during the rescue operation is that for the first time since 1950 the American people could themselves learn what really was taking place without preclusive censorship by The Press.

Thus when the rescued American medical students arrived at Kennedy Airport it was impossible to screen from public view the 23-year-old girl who flung herself into her parents' anxiously awaiting arms and cried out, "Those Marines—they were so strong and brave and kind!"

Kind? Kind? That adjective left the media horde dumbstruck, accustomed as most of them are to hearing and reading since 1950 mainly the harshest derogative of our American military.

It was in 1950 that two major events occurred which adversely affected the security of every American and that of our nation and the entire free world. The first of these events was adoption by President Harry Truman, April 1950, of a top secret overall foreign policy directive, National Security Council Document 68, which was foisted on him by Dean Acheson, George F. Kennan and Averell Harriman. Referred to among the intellectual clique who framed NSC-68 as the "containment of communism" policy, it actually was the formulation of a rigid "no-win" doctrine applied to our country only. NSC-68 urges avoidance of nuclear war through U.S. acceptance of a Soviet first strike and NSC-68 forbids any U.S. action "directly challenging Soviet prestige."

The second major 1950 event adversely affecting our internal and external national security was announcement by The New York Times that it was abandoning our traditional journalistic distinction between straight news and editorial writing in favor of adopting what it described as "interpretive reporting" but in reality was propagandizing. Consequently, Times man Thomas J. Hamilton, newly elected president of the United Nations Correspondents Association, proposed abandonment of objective reporting on the U.N. "for the sake of an ideal."

The full consequences of our no-win foreign policy, which was kept top secret until February 1975, and of our acceptance of "interpretive reporting" which shielded the Communist movement from direct challenges to its prestige, became obvious to the American people only in October 1983 when our "sitting duck" Marines were massacred at Beirut Airport in Lebanon and thereafter the Reagan Administration had the courage to undertake a winning military operation in Grenada.

In vitriolic criticism of the Reagan military policy, Sam Donaldson burst out on the Sunday morning ABC-TV News discussion "I am a believer in the Acheson-Kennan containment policy." Thus he exposed himself, as do almost all our prominent media stars, as an ideologue not an objective newsperson.

The 30th anniversary issue of Playboy magazine, dated January 1984, carries a long exclusive interview with Dan Rather who declares, "The only person I'll listen to in criticism about our [CBS'] coverage of the Soviet Union is Harrison Salisbury. He can lay down aces in terms of his experience of covering it. With everybody else, my attitude on it is '—— you.' I don't think other people have a lot to crow about." Informed Americans know that Harrison Salisbury, formerly of the New York Times is as pro-Soviet as Herbert Matthews of the New York Times was pro-Castro.

On November 30, 1983, Mary Bedell Smith reported in The Times that Peter Jennings of ABC-TV told her "99% of the phone calls I received about barring the press from Grenada were in favor of the [U.S.] government." The Times/CBS poll showed 91% in favor of the Reagan Administration and against the press. Repeatedly, newsmen who had been in World War II referred to their patriotism and trustworthiness during those times in order to try to impress the public with their fitness to guard our secrets, protect American lives and be true to American ideals today in Central America, the Middle East or anywhere else. This media effort at reassurance is totally ineffective because we Americans have learned that things are far different now in political and moral points of view than they were before. Since 1950 our nation has never been in a declared war with the press legally under wartime censorship and legal restraints as in World Wars I and II. Nor have we had an "enemy" but merely an adversary, according to NSC-68. Though we have lost more than 100,000 American military men killed in the Korean United Nations Police Action and the Vietnam Military Advisory Operations, our media representatives were entirely free of legal and social penalties for consorting with or aiding the Communists who were killing us.

Why? Not one in a million Americans is aware that there is only one federal crime in our U.S. Constitution—treason. And treason is strictly defined as giving aid and comfort to the enemy in time of war. Only Congress can declare war. So the aid and comfort individuals such as Jane Fonda, Daniel Ellsberg and others amply gave to our murderous "adversaries" in Peking and Hanoi cannot be legally prosecuted as treason and all have been welcomed by our media who have provided them with a reversible all-weather political cloak—First Amendment absolutism on one side and anti-anti-communism on the other.

As thousands upon thousands of Americans stood in the streets of San Francisco and New York City to welcome home General Douglas MacArthur after his dismissal as commander of our forces in Korea, 1951, they knew in the marrow of their bones that something was wrong, very wrong. Not one in a million Americans knew that the "something" wrong was the secret NSC-68. In May 1951 General MacArthur told me in a long exclusive interview at his office in Manhattan:

"Always in war when I visited my wounded in the hospital, I could look them in the eye, no matter what their condition or how tragic their wounds, knowing that our country had backed them to the hilt.

"But when I went to see my Korean War wounded, I just couldn't look them in the eye, knowing they had been forced to fight with one hand tied behind their backs.

"I went home and walked the floor alone until four o'clock in the morning. I made up my mind what to do and I did it."

The General paused, his eyes full of tears. Then he looked me straight in the eye. "Do you think there is anyone anywhere who can teach me how to shoot down half a bridge?" he said. Again he paused, then said firmly: "I am convinced I was restrained in Korea by some secret Administration policy directive on strategy about which I was not informed."

Under the inexorably intolerant and therefore fascistic intellectual leadership of the Liberal Establishment—the New York Times, Washington Post, Council on Foreign Relations, Columbia Broadcasting Company and American Civil Liberties Union—plus the influence of professional pacifist propagandists preaching and teaching American unilateral disarmament at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, Chicago, and Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, Santa Barbara, California—our once independent media became a cyclops with a single eye fixed on what they perceived to be American faults and blind to the evils of communism. Our greatest military heroes were vilified and the most brutal Red leaders glorified.

On October 30, 1983, I watched over CNN-TV the very first press interview at Bethesda Naval Hospital of our Grenada wounded. I saw the face of Captain Timothy Howard, USMC, while 40 newsmen crowded around his bed. His right arm had been amputated to the elbow. His left leg had 14 multiple fractures. A grimace of intense pain contorted his face. "Please," he said through clenched teeth, "don't jolt my bed." Someone thrust a microphone into his face. "I said," he said, in a voice so full of agony that I burst into tears, "don't jolt my bed." From somewhere came a stern command "OUT!" Later I learned the order came from a Navy public information officer at the hospital too appalled by the media's brutal conduct to utter another word. Also, I later learned that a United Press International reporter was so ashamed of the media conduct that day he wrote a personal letter of apology to Captain Howard and to the medical staff at Bethesda.

The media brutality toward our military did not surprise me. I had a memorable experience with it during the Vietnam War. In March 1966, I received a telephone call from President Lyndon Johnson (whom I never had met or voted for) to tell me that as the result of a newspaper column by Drew Pearson, the Pentagon and White House were swamped with anguished inquiries from families and friends of our wounded patients in Walter Reed Army Hospital. The column charged that while officers were being coddled in luxury at the hospital, the GI's were being cruelly neglected, denied essential needs and even doses of painkilling drugs. Pearson wrote that conditions were so unsanitary that filthy bloodstained bandages were lying everywhere on the floors and heaped high outside the wards to the ceiling. President Johnson asked whether I would be willing to visit Walter Reed and see conditions for myself.

Having paid my own way to Washington, I was met next day by an Army officer who drove me to Walter Reed. No official escorted me or made the slightest suggestion about what I should write.

At first glance, outside the amputees' wards, No. 35 and 36, it did seem as if repulsive bandages were heaped on the floor. The sight was sickening. At second glance, I saw the bandages were in huge transparent plastic bags. The driver of a hospital garbage pickup truck who made the rounds through the hospital halls every 30 minutes said, "Clear plastic is cheaper than opaque." Inside wards 35 and 36, I talked with 93 amputees. I found out the truth about the pain killers. These mutilated suffering young men were on "THE THING." What was that? A voluntary self-organized pact among them to try to refrain from taking pain pills as "chicken" because it seems the drugs act as a depressant and thus retard recovery.

On March 11, 1966, a GI gestured with his right shoulder toward the TV next to his bed in Ward 35 at Walter Reed Hospital. He couldn't gesture with hand and forearm. They had been amputated. "Sometimes," he said scornfully, "while I'm watching and listening to this thing, I get to wondering whether some of the characters on it wouldn't be more with us if we were fighting alongside the Vietcong for the Vietcong."

His remark chilled my blood. Only a couple of weeks earlier I had been at a meeting in Manhattan where Professor Eugene Genovese of Rutgers University, who had publicly proclaimed he would "welcome a Vietcong victory", said the Leftwing intelligentsia in our country "must achieve a Marxist revolution and that is why there exists now in this country the necessity for open advocacy of socialism." To accomplish this, he said, the Leftwing must achieve "cultural hegemony."

As everyone knows, "hegemony" is preponderant authority. There is no doubt that over the years since 1950, with NSC-68 and "interpretive reporting," an elite among the Leftists gained cultural hegemony over our media and this sad situation became more and more evident to the people. Overnight in October 1983 the media found out that though some of the people can indeed be fooled for some of the time, all cannot be fooled all the time. Though the media immediately sought to convert the Grenada rescue into a bitter struggle between the media and the U.S. Government, it has become an open struggle between the media and the people.

On November 20, 1983, New York Times reporter Jonathan Friendly twisted his article into a story about a "feud between the military and the press" and delcared, "The debate about restriction of news coverage of combat in Grenada has brought into the open military suspicions about the press and its patriotism." Jonathan Friendly then referred to the "apparently heartless" media interviews with the families of Marines killed or missing in the Beirut barracks.

What does Friendly mean by "apparently" heartless? Doesn't he know the difference in definition between "obviously" and "apparently"? Obviously he doesn't, but the entire American TV-viewing public did and they found the interviews sadistically intrusive. So did the friends and relatives of the dead or missing Marines who found out that the media at Camp Lejeune, North Carolina, bribed taxi drivers to reveal the addresses to which they had driven Army and Navy chaplains on condolence missions to bereaved, desperately anxious and heartsore parents, grandparents, sisters, brothers and wives.

On November 4, 1983, the Wall Street Journal carried a truly enlightening letter to the editor from Major General John E. Murray, USA Ret. which goes to the vitally important core of our present political, intellectual and moral plight concerning the relationship between the media and the people. General Murray says that the wailing of the press because it was denied advanced briefing and immediate access to the Grenada rescue operation is like that of a child denied a stick of candy unaware it was a stick of dynamite. "Surprise, celerity and concentration are the quintessence of military success," Gen. Murray writes. "A commander has a hole in his head and a hole in his plan if he sacrifices secrecy."

The media say they maintained utmost secrecy in World Wars I and II. So they did. But—they were operating under total wartime censorship which never has been put into practice by our country since 1945. If it had, several of our leading media pets would now be serving long prison terms for treasonable aid and comfort to the enemy.

Another aspect of our media overprivilege is their total freedom from any kind of professional disciplinary control. Every other profession is under some kind of disciplinary scrutiny or regulation—the police by civilian boards, physicians by state boards of medicine on charges of malpractice, lawyers by the American Bar Association, etc. However, our media do exactly as they please without fear of professional discipline and much of what they please to do is crude, brutal, immoral and degrading.

General Murray writes what every military man who fought in Vietnam and Southeast Asia knows: "Among them [the press] there are what can only be charitably termed criminal inclinations. The media, unlike the soldiery, do not come under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Why weren't the culprits among them tried in Vietnam for illicit money involvement and drug activities? There were those among the media in Vietnam who had it better than Jesse James. They were outlaws with no law to punish them. Then there is that pitiless commonplace invasion of a soldier's and his family's privacy in what may be his last pains by TV and photographic pimps—an arrogance in another's agony that is beyond forgiving. Contrary to presumption, Last Rites do not grant last picture rights to blood-thirsty media Draculas."

On November 30, the Wall Street Journal carried an extremely revealing report. "Returning State Department Files" by staff reporter Jonathan Kwitny who recounted the story of what happened at Channel 5 in Washington, D.C. after newscaster James Adams received a call from inmates at District of Columbia prison, Lorton, Virginia, that they were in possession of confidential U.S. Government files accidentally left in a cabinet sent there for refurbishing. Mr. Adams and Channel 5 news director Betty Endicott notified the State Department, broadcast an announcement of what had happened and turned the documents over to U.S. Senator Charles Mathias because, they said, "he is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he is cleared to read classified material and he is in a position where he can provide oversight on security breakdowns."

Immediately there came a vociferous outburst of indignation from media bigwigs Jack Anderson and Seymour Hersh, both professionals being anti-U.S. authorities and anti-U.S. military muckrakers. There representatives and other media characters, says Mr. Kwitny, hounded Mr. Adams and Mrs. Endicott for copies of the classified papers. "You're giving away gold!" they complained. There was indeed a fortune to be made out of the secret U.S. Government documents and their fingers itched for part or all of it. Equally appalled at the lost opportunity at whatever cost to our country's success and prestige was Robert MacNeil of the Public Broadcasting MacNeil-Lehrer Report. What these mercenary careerists appear to want above all else is the chance to place "a smoking gun" in the hands of any public or private individual holding views or taking action which the media elite oppose.

Reporter Jonathan Kwitny interviewed the heads of two influential American schools of journalism about the ethics of James Adams' and Betty Endicott's situation. Naturally, Dean Osborn Elliot of Columbia University School of Journalism said, "A reporter's duty is to report . . . . " Dean James Atwater of the University of Missouri School of Journalism said he would have returned the documents to the State Department without even reading them.

On December 2, 1983, Richard M. Clurman, board chairman of Media and Society Seminars, Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism, wrote an op-ed piece entitled "The Media Learn a Lesson" for the New York Times. Too many journalists, he wrote, "decided that their primary function was to act as adversaries to all the powers that be. Moreover, reporters sometimes are often too poorly prepared for the complex subjects they must cover; others lack training in standards of ethical judgment and conduct. Many, from their bunkers often fail to distinguish between junk and important information. . . . For their own welfare and for the good of our democracy, the media need to start making their case, in words and conduct, better than they have. For now, they are plainly exasperating the public, whose support they need to preserve their protected and crucial vigor."

The key word in Mr. Clurman's statement, in my opinion, is "protected." Assiduously, since 1950, our media have used secrecy—the very means they profess to reject—in order to hide, discredit or keep away from the public the advocacy of domestic and foreign policies which they oppose ideologically. This is how they obtained their overprivileged status. Thus, for example, they were able to censor or suppress exceptionally important books by authorities and experts such as General Thomas Powers, Commander-in-Chief, U.S. Strategic Air Command and by General Albert C. Wedemeyer.

Through misuse of our First Amendment the media have flung open doors shutting out libel and vilest obscenity. They have used the "docudrama" to blot out the distinction between fact and fiction.

Worst of all, most of the overprivileged media elite have sought to ridicule and undermine the traditional ideals of our individual citizen's devotion to duty, honor and country, ideals which have brought out the best in most of us cherishing our Republic of the United States of America.●

REFERRAL OF S. 1329

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a unanimous-consent request regarding referral which bears the approval notation of the minority leader, and I thank him for his consideration and that of other Senators.

I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 643, S. 1329, be referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources for a period of not to exceed 60 calendar days, to consider sections 201 and 204.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR LOCATION OF "PROGRAM" IN THE RECORD

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have discussed the next request with the minority leader. Indeed, he brought the matter to my attention, for which I am grateful.

Senators will notice that, usually, in the course of the concluding moments of the session, I ask unanimous consent that a statement of the program for the following day, or sometimes several days in advance, may appear as the last item in the Senate portion of the RECORD for that day. In order to provide that on a regular basis, just in case I forget to ask someday, it might be good to make that proviso for the balance of this Congress. The minority leader has indicated to me that he does not object to that, for which I am grateful.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that for the balance of this session of Congress, the statement of the program that may be given by me from time to time will appear as the last item in the Senate portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that day, just prior to the adjournment or recess provision.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I do not object—this is valuable information, and it should appear at the point in the RECORD where Senators know they can find it quickly. It seems to me that at the close of the day is the time and the place for that statement by the majority leader, regardless of when during the day he makes it. I think it is an important request and I certainly agree with him.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I put the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DUTY-FREE ENTRY OF OLYMPIC EQUIPMENT, PERSONAL EFFECTS, AND RELATED ARTICLES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I believe the request I am about to make has been cleared by the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on House Joint Resolution 290.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution (H.J. Res. 290) entitled "Joint resolution to permit free entry into the United States of the personal effects, equipment, and other related articles of foreign participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations involved in the games of the XXIII Olympiad to be held in the United States in 1984", with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert:

That subpart B of part 1 of the Appendix to the Tariff Schedules of the United States (19 U.S.C. 1202) is amended by inserting in numerical sequence the following new item:

" 915.00	Personal effects of aliens who are participants in or officials of the XXIII Olympiad, or who are accredited members of delegations thereto, or who are members of the immediate families of any of the foregoing persons, or who are their servants; equipment for use in connection with the games; and other related articles as prescribed in regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury	Free	Free	On or before 9/30/84 ".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this joint resolution shall apply with respect to articles—

(1) entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution; or

(2) entered under temporary importation bond after June 30, 1983 and before such fifteenth day.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased today to bring to the Senate, for its final consideration, House Joint Resolution 290, a bill to provide simplified duty-free treatment of articles imported into the United States for use in next summer's Los Angeles Olympic Games. Although its substance is quite limited in nature and scope, the bill is of major importance to the Los Angeles Olympic Committee's efforts to simplify the preparation of hundreds of athletes and athletic officials worldwide for the competition that will commence in just a few months. I thus urge that my colleagues agree expeditiously to approve this resolution.

House Joint Resolution 290 would provide duty-free entry into the United States for the personal effects of foreign athletes and officials participating in the 1984 summer games, as well as their athletic equipment and other related articles. The intent of this legislation is to facilitate the entry into this country of the foreign participants, members of their immediate families, officials, and accredited members of delegations from the participating countries. The resolution provides that the duty-free treatment it authorizes will expire September 30, 1984; this is, of course, soon after the conclusion of the games. It will apply retroactively to articles entered since July 1, 1983.

Current law would allow these articles to be entered and later reexported without payment of duties. But the required bonding and administrative procedures impose an onerous burden on the participants in the games, who after all will be here for but a short time. Moreover, these visitors look to the Olympic Committee officials to provide smooth entry for them and their necessary equipment—an enormously complex task, given the number of participants and diversity of countries involved. This bill will simplify their burden, allowing resources to be directed to far more important endeavors, such as providing security to our visitors and spectators.

Regulations to be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to House Joint Resolution 290 will insure that the articles to which it records duty-free treatment will not be later sold in the United States and must be reexported unless consumed or destroyed. These regulations will preclude any possible abuse of this temporary tariff provision.

Mr. President, House Joint Resolution 290 first passed the House of Representatives on April 28, 1983. The Committee on Finance approved and ordered it favorably reported on November 10, 1983, both as House Joint Resolution 290 and as section 140 of H.R. 3398, the omnibus miscellaneous tariff bill. The Senate passed the bill last November 18, but substituted for its text an amendment by Senator MCCLURE relating to a tax matter. The House on Thursday passed the resolution again in the form earlier approved by the Committee on Finance, but that body deleted the amendment by Mr. MCCLURE. Thus, we have reached a point 10 months after the first House approval where the Olympic committee still cannot tell the participants in the games the procedures they must follow in order to enter the United States. With the games scheduled to commence in just a few short months, it is time for the Congress to resolve this matter.

In view of the national interest in hosting a successful olympiad, Senator McCLURE has graciously consented to accede to the House action. I supported his amendment, and therefore share his disappointment in the House action and the circumstances that now force us to move forward on the legislation without his amendment. I wish to express my appreciation for his action, and my continued strong support for his amendment.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President will, the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, as my colleagues know, this measure passed the Senate during the wanning days of the first session of the 98th Congress. At that time, the Senate approved an amendment I sponsored relating to the relief of States from an unnecessary duplicative tax mailing requirement. Unfortunately, for one reason or another, the House Ways and Means Committee did not approve my amendment and sent House Joint Resolution 290 back to the Senate without my amendment.

I certainly understand the leadership's desire to move this legislation as soon as possible, and I do not want to hold things up. Since the mailing requirement will not affect States until next January, I think there will be another opportunity to move my amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Idaho's comments and appreciate his willingness to move the Olympic tariff bill. As he knows, the Senate Finance Committee has approved the essence of his amendments, and I do not have any problem with including it in a tax package that moves later this year. I think we can give the States the necessary relief before next January without interfering with this legislation and the Olympics.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDERS FOR TUESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10:30 A.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 10:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, Senators SPECTER, MURKOWSKI, PRYOR, and BYRD be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes each, and in that order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS ON TOMORROW FROM 12 NOON UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, tomorrow is Tuesday. As is our custom, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess between the hours of 12 noon and 2 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, tomorrow will be a busy day. We will have at least two bills up and perhaps more. I hope we can finish both of them.

RECESS UNTIL 10:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that matter is disposed of. I know of no other matter to be dealt with today. The minority leader is in the Chamber. If he has nothing further to address the Senate, and I gather he does not, then I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until 10:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 5:20 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 7, 1984, at 10:30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, February 6, 1984

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Don Bartow, pastor, Westminster Presbyterian Church, Canton, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, enable me and all present to quiet the mind, spirit, and body. May the sacred stillness of our whole being be fertile soil on which Your Spirit may fall.

Among the many things for which we yearn and for which we pray is the spirit of wisdom. Individually and corporately we seek Your wisdom. Please grant to us Your wisdom. In like manner grant that Your wisdom be welcomed. Your wisdom be heeded and Your ways pursued.

Grant to each of us the presence of mind, the determination of spirit, and the courage of soul to search for Your will and to live out Your will in life. May we further the good of all to Your glory and honor. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate has passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 220. Concurrent resolution condemning the action of the so-called Turkish Federated State of Cyprus in declaring itself to be an independent state on Cyprus on November 15, 1983.

The message also announced that the Senate has passed with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 1492. An act to establish the Christopher Columbus Quincentenary Jubilee Commission.

The message also announced that the Vice President, pursuant to the provisions of sections 276(h)-276(k) of title 22 of the United States Code, as amended, appoints Mrs. KASSEBAUM to chair the Senate delegation to the Mexico-United States Interparliamentary Group during the 2d session of the 98th Congress.

THE REVEREND DON BARTOW

(Mr. REGULA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, the invocation today was given by Pastor Don Bartow from the 16th District. Pastor Bartow is the senior minister at the Westminster Presbyterian Church in Canton, Ohio, the Football Hall of Fame city. He has been there since 1966.

He began his ministry in 1948.

He has had many goals in life, but none more challenging than that of bringing God's healing power into the ministry, not only to his members but to the members of the community at large.

Pastor Bartow has put his thoughts in many different books that are published and accepted as important texts on the art of healing.

He also does a daily devotional called the Ministry of the Master that is circulated very widely.

Pastor Bartow's writing resources in both books and the daily ministry are used in 50 of the States and in 15 other countries.

In addition, he conducts healing conferences twice a year at the Westminster Church. These effective conferences have reached thousands with the message that a healing ministry can and should be a part of the local body of believers. On Thursday of this week at 10 a.m. he will appear on the 700 Club and tell the story of his healing ministry. He has experienced this personally and brings the message to many others.

Pastor Bartow and his wife Mary work together. His wife is involved in the medical side of healing by working as a certified medical assistant for cardiologists. They both serve as a team working to relate the area of spiritual healing and the field of medicine.

We are pleased that Pastor Bartow could join us in the House today to give the invocation.

GUIDELINES FOR ETHYLENE DIBROMIDE

(Mr. BROWN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, February 3, EPA issued voluntary guidelines for tolerance limits for the chemical EDB—ethylene dibromide—in ready-to-eat food, as well as in stored and processed grain. EPA has also acted previously to ban EDB for certain uses in agriculture and has extended that ban now to additional uses. The action was hardly a surprise, since it has been under consideration for months, if not years, and in the form finally taken the action was a compromise among many considerations, foremost of which was an effort to balance economic impact on agriculture and the chemical industry against health impacts to the U.S. consumer. The action taken will be unlikely to satisfy very many of the various parties involved. It will have the benefit, however, of raising the issue to a higher level of visibility and hopefully bringing about some further progress in resolving several very important policy issues which must be addressed.

Because I have received a number of inquiries from my colleagues and the media on this issue, as well as some hints that perhaps I, and the subcommittee which I chair, have been less than diligent in addressing this problem, I shall take a special order later in the day to deal with the history of this issue, the policy issues raised by it, and the steps which the Congress must take to solve this particular problem, as well as a substantial number of similar problems which will inevitably surface over the next few years.

In that connection I will include in the RECORD material from our subcommittee reports, as well as GAO and CRS reports which we have requested. I invite any other Members with an interest in this subject to join me in this special order.

GETTING THE TROOPS OUT OF LEBANON

(Mr. WEAVER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, the situation in Lebanon is deteriorating rapidly and most seriously threatening the position of our Marines there. That makes it essential and all the more important that this House address the situation in Lebanon and our Marines immediately.

The Lebanon resolution should be brought up as soon as possible so this House may debate it. I am sure that it is all right with the Democratic leadership that a unanimous-consent request be made to bring up the Lebanon resolution Wednesday or Thursday and I therefore yield to the Republican leadership to see if they would accept a unanimous-consent request to bring up the Lebanon resolution this week.

The Republican leadership says they would object to having the Lebanon resolution brought up, therefore keeping our Marines in Lebanon, continuing to be threatened and their lives in jeopardy.

WE ARE NOT PLAYING A GAME IN BEIRUT

(Mr. FRANK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration has just given us a very unfortunate explanation of the phrase "adding insult to injury." To those of us who think that the marines on the ground in Beirut do nothing to advance our national interest and that proper military power can be applied by the 6th Fleet offshore, we have been told by the President's spokesperson that we are aiding and abetting the enemy.

When people objected to that despicable injection of that kind of McCarthy-ite rhetoric into a legitimate debate, his response was that "is the way the game is played."

Mr. Speaker, 1,500 American marines in Beirut are not playing a game. Those of us who think that we are necessarily endangering young American lives for no good reason are not playing a game. Those of us who believe that the proper application of power in the national interest is provided by the 6th Fleet and not by 1,500 marines living 15 feet below the ground in unused cargo containers are not playing a game. We are trying to establish valid parameters for American policy. For the administration to persist in the error that it made of keeping the Marines there, endangering their lives for no purpose is a very serious problem. For them to poison the debate by these kinds of efforts to question people's patriotism when they are in fact expressing what it seems to me is the essence of patriotism, which is to see to the proper protection of the American Armed Forces, only compounds the error.

THE PRESIDENT SHOULD PAY ATTENTION. THIS IS A SENSELESS POLICY

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the situation in Lebanon is reaching crisis proportions. The recent collapse of the Gemayel government, the resignation of its cabinet, makes the situation in Lebanon untenable and we continue to play politics with the lives of our marines.

I cannot understand how the President, and the Secretary of State, continue to say that our policy will remain unchanged and that they will not pay attention to a congressional resolution urging prompt withdrawal of U.S. Marines. Even after 216 marines have died, even after the Long Commission report, even after the House Armed Services Committee report, even after the collapse this weekend, of virtually all of the Lebanese Government.

Mr. Speaker, what is it going to take to change this senseless policy when the President even says he will not pay attention to a congressional resolution, saying that he does not care what the American people want and what they say.

Mr. Speaker, the American people clearly want to get our marines out from Lebanon, I submit.

Do the American people have a voice in this matter? According to the President and the Secretary of State they do not.

UTILITY RATEPAYERS OUGHT NOT TO BEAR THE RISK OF FAILURES

(Mr. BOSCO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOSCO. Mr. Speaker, today the House will be considering the CWIP Policy Act of 1983. The issue before us is whether consumers should be routinely forced to pay for energy they may never receive. Most consumers would rightly say no. Not so the Nation's investor owned utilities. Not content with their position as monopolies—insulated from the pressures of the marketplace, their financial health guaranteed by State and Federal regulators—they are now asking to be relieved of the only significant risks they still bear: The risks involved in building new powerplants with their own money. Those risks are considerable; the money they may waste is their stockholders. Stockholders, unlike utility ratepayers, have the option of taking their business elsewhere if their investments are mismanaged. Ratepayers have no such choice. Ratepayers have no say in the decision to build or abandon a new powerplant. They do not reap the profits from the utility's successful ventures, and they should not be asked to bear the risk of the failures. The traditional restriction on payments for construction work in progress is based on sound principles of capital investment. Consumers have a right to get what they pay for and only pay for what they get.

BARBER CONABLE'S RETIREMENT

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, no retirement from the House has shocked me more than that of BARBER CONABLE, who announced today he would not seek another term.

I deeply regret his decision to leave us, but I can fully appreciate the reasons why. Many of those reasons are shared by a number of other first-class Republicans who have decided not to run again.

LARRY WINN of Kansas, our ranking member on Science and Technology; JOHN ERLENBORN, my fellow Illinoisan and ranking on Education and Labor; KENNY ROBINSON of Virginia, ranking on Intelligence Committee; JACK EDWARDS of Alabama, ranking on the Defense Subcommittee of Appropriations, and now BARBER CONABLE, ranking on Ways and Means.

These men know the frustration of coming to work every day being outnumbered on the committees on which they serve. They know what it is like not just being subjected to minority status, but being subjected to unfair and unequal minority status to boot.

There is more work, less reward, less credit, less dignity and decorum and more harassment.

The American people will never understand or appreciate what BARBER and these other individuals have done or the devastating loss to the legislative process that will result from their leaving this body.

We need good men and women in Government, but they are leaving.

We all had better start asking ourselves why. And for me personally, make a plea to my side "No more please. Don't leave me stranded."

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to permit voluntary school prayer. The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request, I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership. I would now yield to a spokesman for the majority leadership for an appropriate clearance.

Am I getting the appropriate clearance from the gentleman from Louisiana?

Now he is shaking his head no.

All right, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I hear no response, even on a day when we have very little scheduled in the way of legislative business we cannot take up this issue that is a vital concern to about 85 percent of the American people.

That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of voluntary school prayer, the Democratic leadership of this House.

AMENDMENT TO REQUIRE A BALANCED BUDGET

(Mr. WEBER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I too rise in an attempt to free one of the hostage amendments, in this case an amendment that has been spearheaded in this body by the the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE), whose retirement was unfortunately announced today.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to require a balanced budget.

The Chair again has ruled that in order to make this request, I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership and I would yield to a spokesman from the majority for an appropriate clearance.

Hearing none, it should be clear again to the American people who is holding the balanced budget amendment hostage, the Democratic leadership.

WHAT A DIFFERENCE A YEAR MAKES

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, what a difference a year makes.

Last year at this time there was a daily parade of individuals who would have taken the microphone and begin to chastise the President of the United States for his economic policies, citing the unemployment figures, which were going up and up, the gross national product figures, which were going down.

What a difference a year makes.

Here we stand here today without one critic of the economic picture of the United States having taken the podium. Why? Because unemployment is significantly down, gross national product is up, average weekly income for the American people is up, and all the economic indicators point toward not just a recovery but an unprecedented period of prosperity in which we will all share as American citizens.

It now is the duty of all of us to face clearly, even more, action on the part of this Congress as to those deficits by cutting spending and doing the other things that will be necessary to make sure that this economy stays on the upswing.

I thank the Speaker.

ON PERMITTING A LINE-ITEM VETO

(Mr. MACK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, I too am rather distressed by the words that we heard this morning of BARBER CONABLE's decision not to run for reelection. I hope that his decision was not affected a great deal by the ratios and the other things that we in the minority have to put up with. I personally, and I know other Members certainly also, looked to Members such as BARBER CONABLE for direction and for experience.

I just left the Budget Committee hearings, the first that we have held so far this year, and I listened to the discussion centering around whether we could do anything about a downpayment on the budget deficits for 1985.

I am pleased to say that there was more positive discussion this morning than in all of what I heard last year. But in order to really be able to do something significant, I also believe that we have to do something about a line-item veto.

Therefore, at this time I had hoped to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to permit a line-item veto.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have clearance of the majority and minority leadership. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I would now yield to a spokesman for the majority leadership for an appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response.

That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of the line-item veto, the Democratic leadership of this House.

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that not one of my colleagues will disagree with me when I say that the Congressional Research Service is one of the most valuable resources that we have on Capitol Hill. Often, CRS is a resource that all of us take for granted. I know for certain that my office simply could not function efficiently if CRS did not exist.

In addition to providing us with information when we need it, CRS also provides Members and their offices with a series of ongoing programs. These programs encompass a wide range of subject material: information sources, the legislative process and public policy issues. All of these programs are dedicated to the professional development of congressional staff. CRS offers us: the Public Policy Issues Institute, the Capitol Hill Information Seminar, three levels of Legislative Institutes, the District/State Staff Institute, the Budget Institute, and a wide range of seminars and workshops.

These programs are exceptionally well put together and serve as an invaluable tool to us and our staff, as we go about our business of serving the Nation's people.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to encourage all of my colleagues to take full advantage of the programs offered by CRS. I also want to take this opportunity to congratulate the Director of CRS, Mr. Gilbert Gude, on the excellence of his organization. Let me also extend my heartfelt thanks and appreciation to every employee of CRS for a job well done. To you, I say: We just couldn't do it without you.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting the "1984 Projected Institute Dates," and "CRS Products" immediately following my remarks.

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR., TO RETIRE

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I want to follow the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BOB MICHEL, in calling attention to the pending retirement of the gentleman from New York, Mr. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

All of us know that there is no essential Member in this House and yet, in my judgment, BARBER CONABLE comes as close to being the essential Member as I have seen in my years of service.

I think all of us will respect his choice. It is a wise politician who knows when to retire.

Nevertheless, this House, his constituents, and our Republic are going to be the poorer because of his retirement.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman serves with him on the Ways and Means Committee. I serve with him in western New York. His district is contiguous to mine.

I think BARBER CONABLE is truly the epitome of what we are meant to be as U.S. Congressmen, and Congressmen who put our country ahead of party. BARBER CONABLE will not only be missed by those of us on this side of the aisle, I am sure he will be missed by this Nation, which owes him a great debt of gratitude.

And I appreciate the gentleman from Minnesota alluding to the tremendous example he has set for all of us, Republican and Democrat alike.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the distinguished dean of the New York delegation.

Mr. HORTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to share the sentiment that the gentleman has already expressed and our leader, BOB MICHEL, expressed earlier about the intended retirement of BARBER CONABLE from the Congress.

He has been here 20 years. Of the 22 years I have been here, I have served 20 of them with him. His district includes part of the city of Rochester, which I represent.

I do not think we have had a finer Representative from any part of the country than BARBER CONABLE. He is highly intelligent, very experienced, and he is the kind of people that we cannot do without. He is one of the outstanding legislators and we are going to miss his presence here in the 99th Congress.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PEASE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Lest this appear to be exclusively a love fest on the part of the minority party, I would like to add my words also in praise of BARBER CONABLE.

During the years that I have been on the Ways and Means Committee, he has done an absolutely outstanding job of leading the minority side of the Ways and Means Committee, has provided a great many insights and a great deal of knowledge on tax matters to the Ways and Means Committee.

The committee is going to sorely miss him in the years ahead.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARTIN of New York. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Very briefly, I would like to be associated with the remarks of the gentleman as well as the previous speakers.

I have know BARBER CONABLE not only as a colleague here in the House, but when I was in the State assembly, we looked to BARBER in a great many instances to help us out in interfacing the tax policies between the State and Federal Governments. And he was always willing and always able to take the time and resolve the problems that you had.

I solute BARBER CONABLE for his many years of outstanding service to this country.

CONTRADICTIONS IN THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

(Mr. MOODY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, today I continue to point up the contradictions and inaccuracies in the President's recent economic messages and budget.

The President said in his state of the Union message and elsewhere that taxes are the same as borrowing because they both take the same amount of money from the private sector. He obviously has a preference for borrowing as opposed to taxes.

This statement is factually incorrect. Borrowing comes strictly from capital, strictly from the money that would be invested in investment. Whereas taxes come from both consumption and from savings. Therefore, part of the burden of taxes is taken out of consumption; whereas borrowing comes strictly out of capital, an important inaccuracy the President continues to perpetuate.

Second, his statement does not take account of the interest cost of borrowing. In 1985, the budget before us contemplates $164½ billion in interest cost for the Federal budget deficit and debts before it, not the $116 billion figure which has frequently been used, because that $116 billion figure, Mr. Speaker, represents a number of offsets, predominantly interagency interest charges between branches of the Government and therefore, are misleading and grossly understates the costs of borrowing. The cost of borrowing is $164½ billion.

NATIONAL FISH AND WILDLIFE FOUNDATION ESTABLISHMENT ACT

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2809) to establish a U.S. Fish and Wildlife Foundation, with the Senate amendments thereto, concur with the Senate amendments numbered 1, 2 and 3, and concur in the Senate amendment numbered 4 with an amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments and the proposed House amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendments: Page 2, line 8, strike out "fish and wildlife" and insert "fish, wildlife, and plant".

Page 3, line 11, after "filled" insert "within sixty days of said vacancy".

Page 6, line 19, strike out "malfeasance;" and insert "gross negligence,".

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee for an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2809 would establish a National Fish and Wildlife Foundation.

In 1978, with the passage of the Fish and Wildlife Improvements Act, Congress authorized the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to accept virtually all forms of donations, both in the form of real and personal property. This provision of law has proved to be beneficial, particularly in terms of donations of wildlife habitat. However, there is no mechanism for the Fish and Wildlife Service to manage trusts or other requests that are designed to provide income over an extended period of time. H.R. 2809 resolves this problem by establishing a Fish and Wildlife Foundation, similar to the U.S. Part Service Foundation, to accept and administer gifts of real or personal property or income therefrom for the benefit of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and to further the conservation and management of fish and wildlife resources.

The Foundation that would be established by the legislation would be a charitable and nonprofit corporation. It would be administered by a Foundation Board consisting of nine members appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. The initial terms of the Foundation Board would be staggered to insure continuity. At least three members of the Board would have to be educated and experienced in the principles of wildlife management. The legislation also provides that the members of the Board, to the extent practicable, represent diverse points of view relating to fish and wildlife conservation. The Secretary would be authorized to provide administrative support to the Foundation for a period of 5 years after the legislation is enacted. An authorization of $1 million over a 10-year period in matching funds included in the legislation would encourage private contributions and accelerate the establishment of a meaningful endowment.

We passed this legislation out of the House on July 12, 1983. In the last days of the last session, the other body sent it back to us with some minor changes, the most significant of which is to include the conservation of rare plants as a purpose of the Foundation. None of the changes affect the substance of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, with tight budgets limiting the roles of the Fish and Wildlife Service, and with the great interest many Americans have in conserving wildlife, we believe this legislation could provide some very needed support to an agency whose role is important to maintaining the quality of life in this country and we urge its adoption.

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today is H.R. 2809, legislation to establish a National Fish and Wildlife Service Foundation.

This legislation establishes the Foundation as a nonprofit organization with the authority to receive, accept, and manage all forms of donations, trusts, and bequests. It allows for a nine-member Board of Directors to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior for 6-year terms. The Board will consist of persons knowledgeable or experienced in fish and wildlife conservation who represent diverse points of view on related issues. The Board will appoint officers and employees when there is enough money in the Foundation to sustain a staff. The Chief Executive Officer, who is appointed by the Board, must also be knowledgeable in fish and wildlife matters.

This measure was favorably reported by both the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and the Ways and Means Committee. It passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous voice vote under suspension of the rules on July 12, 1983.

Today the House is considering H.R. 2809, as amended by the Senate. The Senate amendments include four technical changes, outlined below, which bring the bill into conformity with existing laws and procedures.

The first change occurs in section 2 of the bill where the purposes of the Foundation were amended to include conservation and management of plant resources.

The second change occurs in section 3 of the legislation where the Senate included language which would require that a vacancy on the Board of Directors be filled within 60 days. Prior to this amendment, there was no time limit for filling such a vacancy.

The third change occurs in section 4 which establishes the rights and obligations of the Foundation. The Senate version says the Directors cannot be personally liable except for "gross negligence," whereas the House bill used the word "malfeasance." This change conforms the bill to the usual standard for personal liability.

The fourth change made by the Senate makes the authorization contained in this bill effective October 1, 1984, in lieu of October 1, 1983, since the earlier date has already passed.

I urge my colleagues to adopt the Senate changes and pass H.R. 2809 so that those individuals and groups who wish to make assets available to the Fish and Wildlife Service for the protection of our precious natural resources may do so without difficulty.●

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the legislation just considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREAUX. Section 6(d) of the Lacey Act amendments of 1981 (16 U.S.C. 3375(d)) and section 11(d) of the Endangered Species Act of 1973 (16 U.S.C. 1540(d)) are each amended—

(1) by amending the subsection side heading to read as follows: "REWARDS AND CERTAIN INCIDENTAL EXPENSES.—"; and

(2) by amending the first sentence—

(A) by striking out "a reward" and inserting in lieu thereof a common;

(B) by inserting "(1) a reward" immediately before "to any person"; and

(C) by inserting immediately before the period the following: ", and (2) the reasonable and necessary costs incurred by any person in providing temporary care for any fish, wildlife, or plant pending the disposition of any civil or criminal proceeding alleging a violation of this Act with respect to that fish, wildlife, or plant".

Mr. BREAUX (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I would like to yield to the chairman of the subcommittee for an explanation of the amendments.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation before the House, H.R. 1723, originally passed the House on April 19, 1983. The other body passed the bill in the last hours of the last session after adopting an amendment that I will explain shortly.

The purpose of H.R. 1723 is to extend for 3 years the current authorization for the acquisition of three national wildlife refuges. These refuges include: Great Dismal Swamp, Minnesota Valley, and San Francisco Bay. In addition, the bill would increase the authorization for appropriation for land acquisition and development at the Great Dismal Swamp and the Minnesota Valley National Wildlife Refuges.

The three refuges being considered for reauthorization are worthy components of the national wildlife refuge system providing not only habitat for wildlife, but also, because of their proximity to large population centers, providing millions of citizens the opportunity to develop a greater appreciation of the importance of wildlife. However, the projected habitat improvement and public use development needs necessary to maintain the quality of wildlife habitat and to provide wildlife education and recreation to the public will require an increase in authorizations. This bill would provide for the necessary increase in authorization levels to preserve these important refuge areas.

Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, when the other body passed this bill, it passed an amendment that would extend, until expended, the authorization of funds available for acquisition and development of Great Dismal Swamp National Wildlife Refuge and land acquisition of San Francisco and Minnesota Valley National Wildlife Refuges. In addition, the other body amended the bill to increase the acreage of the Minnesota Valley National Wildlife Refuge by 2,900 acres and increase the authorization for land acquisition to $29.5 million to reflect the cost of the additional land. This adjustment of the refuge boundaries as proposed in the Minnesota Valley National Wildlife Refuge master plan prepared by the Department of the Interior would involve boundary realinement of lands lying within the designated refuge and recreation area to insure better protection and resource management. The expansion of boundaries beyond that area authorized by Congress would facilitate public use of the area. Finally, the amendment of the other body would require that the Fish and Wildlife Service acquire full fee title on lands that are now being offered for sale rather than partial interests.

Mr. Speaker, we propose to accept the amendment of the other body with a minor amendment of our own to address a problem that has been brought to our attention by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and the American Association of Zoological Parks & Aquariums. The problem involves the enforcement of the provisions of the Lacey Act and the Endangered Species Act relative to preventing the importation of endangered species or illegally captured animals from abroad. The Fish and Wildlife Service has no facilities for holding animals that they confiscate. Traditionally, they have turned these animals over to zoos or aquariums for keeping while forfeiture proceedings progress through the administrative or court proceedings. When, and if, the animals are eventually forfeited, the defendants are usually required to repay the zoos for the upkeep of the animals. Animals that are endangered or threatened are given to the zoos in partial recompense for upkeep costs. Unfortunately, not all confiscations end in forfeiture. As the Members know, courts often find for the defendants and the birds are returned to the owners. The result is that the zoos can lose thousands of dollars in upkeep charges.

The amendment we have offered is simple. It would allow the Fish and Wildlife Service to use the proceeds of fines and forfeitures to provide reasonable costs for providing the temporary care of live animals. Under present law, the Service can use the proceeds of these fines and forfeitures to pay rewards. They estimate that the cost of this provision will amount to less than $100,000 per year and greatly enhance the wildlife enforcement effort at our ports.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this bill.

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1723, legislation reauthorizing the Great Dismal Swamp, the Minnesota Valley and the San Francisco Bay National Wildlife Refuges. These three refuges are vital parts of the national wildlife refuge system. In addition to conserving important wildlife species and critical habitat, they provide interpretive and educational programs, allowing the public to attain an indepth understanding of the values of fish and wildlife resources.

The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee reported this legislation unanimously on April 13, 1983, and on April 19, 1983, the House of Representatives passed H.R. 1723 by a unanimous vote.

The Senate passed this bill on November 17, 1983, with amendments. One change from the House bill relates to the length of the reathorization. The House reauthorized appropriations for each of the three refuges through September 30, 1986. The Senate chose to extend these authorizations until the available levels are expended.

The other changes are designed to address specific problems concerning the Minnesota Valley National Wildlife Refuge. These changes amend the boundary of that refuge to include those areas which have been identified as compatible to it and allow the State and local governments to donate land to the Minnesota Valley National Wildlife Refuge.

I have examined the Senate amendments very closely. They are beneficial to the refuges involved and are entirely acceptable to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee.

Mr. Speaker, we have one minor amendment to the Senate amendments which is designed to resolve a longstanding inequity without any additional cost to the Government. It will permit the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to reimburse zoos and other facilities out of existing funds for care and feeding of animals confiscated under the Lacey and Endangered Species Acts. It is my understanding that the Senate has no objection to this amendment and will bring this measure to final passage without delay.

I strongly urge my colleagues to give their support to H.R. 1723, as amended, so that acquisition of these important wildlife refuges may proceed without further delay.●

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the legislation just considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York (Mr. HORTON) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS).

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3625, the Inspector General Act Amendments of 1984, would create Offices of Inspector General in the last remaining departments without such offices—the Departments of Justice and Treasury. Other provisions of the bill would conform the existing Offices of Inspector General in the Departments of Energy and Health and Human Services to the Inspector General Act of 1978. Additionally, as requested by the administration, the bill would establish authority for Inspector General personnel to adminster oaths, affirmations, and affidavits and would standardize the salaries of Inspectors General established by the 1978 act.

When the Inspector General Act was originally passed, the Departments of Justice and Treasury were excluded in order to permit additional studies of their operations. The committee's reviews and testimony taken during hearings, however, indicated that these Departments are no different from others in their need to have an Inspector General, and the committee has recommended in three Congresses that Offices of Inspector General be established in both the Department of Justice and the Department of the Treasury. The House approved the necessary legislation in the 96th Congress and again in the 97th Congress. Unfortunately, the Senate never acted on the House-passed bills.

Mr. Speaker, the 1978 act was approved after a review disclosed that audit or investigative units in most agencies were without effective central leadership. The review also found that agency auditors and investigators lacked independence, because they were subordinate to officials who were responsibile for the programs under review. In addition, no procedures existed to assure the Congress was informed of serious problems disclosed by audits and investigations. All of the other departments and agencies now covered by the Inspector General Act originally protested the establishment of independent Inspectors General, just as Treasury and Justice have done. However, I do not know of any department or agency who would now like to see its Office of Inspector General abolished. Inspectors General help management by pointing out problem areas; they report and recommend. They do not interfere with management's direction of an agency.

Mr. Speaker, the administration strongly supports the inspector general concept and has, in fact, established a Council made up of the various Inspectors General to help eliminate problems which cut across the jurisdiction of more than one agency. The 17 existing Inspectors General are working successfully to prevent fraud and waste and improve the efficiency of Government operations. I urge Members to go on record once again in strong support of establishing these offices in the two remaining departments. I urge you to vote for H.R. 3625.

Mr. HORTON. Mr Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my distinguished friend from Texas in strong support of H.R. 3625, the Inspector General Act Amendments of 1984. It is a carefully constructed, long-overdue piece of legislation which—if enacted—will give us independent Inspectors General in the Departments of Justice and Treasury. Enactment of this legislation would bring to 19 the number of independent Inspectors General rooting out fraud, waste, and abuse in major Federal agencies and departments.

The concept of having Inspectors General in Federal departments and agencies was started by the Government Operations Committee in 1976 when I established an IG in the old Health, Education, and Welfare Department, and in 1978 when it passed the Omnibus Inspectors General Act which placed Inspectors General in 12 other departments and agencies. In 1980, IG's were created for an additional five agencies. And finally in 1982, an IG was placed in the Department of Defense. All of these IG's are appointed by the President and are independent of the heads of the agencies they review.

I can tell you today without hesitation that the independent Inspector General concept is working and is producing dramatic results. The latest report from the President's Council on Integrity and Efficiency, tells us that—

In the six months ended September 30, 1983, the combined activities of the Inspectors General resulted in over $8.4 billion in direct savings and improved use of funds, totaling $13.8 billion for the year, and $30.8 billion since March 1981.

The fact of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that—like other agencies and departments—Justice and Treasury can be subject to waste, fraud, and abuse and should benefit from the effective work of independent Inspectors General.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly support H.R. 3625 and urge its approval.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. REID). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. BROOKS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3625, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL DEFICIT UNDERMINING AMERICA'S INDUSTRIES

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, although it is inevitable that the deficit be a political issue, and even though it is an election year, the Nation simply cannot afford to postpone taking significant action to reduce the deficit until next year. Next year, in all probability, will be too late.

The Washington Post of February 1, 1984, in an article by Peter Behr, reports that a new study prepared for nine of the Nation's largest industrial corporations by Data Resources, Inc., concludes that the American economy cannot remain strong unless its manufacturing industries are healthy and growing. The report is quoted as saying:

A nation that casually surrenders leading industrial positions through policies of neglect will find it difficult to stage a comeback.

The report criticizes Federal policymakers for creating a tax system and borrowing policies that favor commercial construction over new factories. It also condemns the overvaluation of the dollar, which resulted in last year's trade imbalance of over $80 billion and a projected trade imbalance of $100 billion in 1984.

The president of Data Resources Inc., Otto Eckstein, is reported as saying that the most important step the administration and Congress can take to reduce interest rates and bring the overvalued dollar down is to reduce the Federal deficit. Mr. Eckstein also criticized the idea that we can allow industrial growth to decline in favor of a service economy, pointing out that manufacturing is crucial to strong economic growth. I agree wholeheartedly, on both points.

Rightwing economists, whose thinking still dominates the Reagan administration, are still chanting the theme of letting the marketplace direct the economy, as though the distortions caused by the administration's $200 billion deficits and $300 billion defense budgets were somehow taking place on another planet. A similar blindness to economic reality afflicted the Republican administrations immediately preceding the Great Crash of 1929 and the Great Depression that followed. If we fail to heed the warning signs this time, the ensuing depression could make the Great Depression of the 1930's look like a picnic.

DEFICITS, INDUSTRY EROSION TIED

(By Peter Behr)

The strength of American industry is being severely eroded by inflated federal budget deficits, an over-valued dollar and governmental neglect, according to a new study prepared for nine of the nation's largest industrial corporations.

The study, by Data Resources Inc., concludes that the American economy cannot remain strong unless its factories and manufacturing plants are healthy and growing.

"A nation that casually surrenders leading industrial positions through policies of neglect will find it difficult to stage a comeback," said the DRI report, which was sponsored by American Telephone & Telegraph Co., Bethlehem Steel Corp., Burlington Industries Inc., E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Eastman Kodak Co., Ford Motor Co., Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., Deere & Co., and Texaco Inc.

"It would be unfounded optimism to believe that the service sector will somehow sustain our economic progress on its own," said the DRI report, the newest entry in a sharp debate among economists and politicians about the condition of the economy and the competitiveness of American busienss.

Otto Eckstein, president of DRI and a professor of economics at Harvard University, said the strongest evidence of an accelerating decline for U.S. manufacturers is the growing international trade deficit. "The decline in our trade position has accelerated very, very dramatically," Eckstein said. "It's snowballing."

In 1965, some 4.3 percent of manufactured goods in the economy were supplied from abroad; by 1980, the figure had risen to 13.5 percent, and "virtually every industry suffered from a major worsening of import penetration," the DRI study said.

Last year, the United States imported $69.4 billion more in goods than it exported, and the 1984 deficit is expected to approach $100 billion. The decline in U.S. manufacturing due to imports will cost up to 2 million jobs this year, Eckstein said.

He asserted that the causes of this long manufacturing decline include inept economic policies, which have helped produce seven recessions in the past three decades, making business management afraid to make long-term investments in costly plant expansion or modernization.

Industry's needs have largely been ignored by Congress and federal policy makers, who created a tax system and borrowing practices that favor commercial construction over new factories, and who have handled industry's trade problems in an indifferent, haphazard way, DRI said.

Finally, a long-running overvaluation of the dollar, except in the mid-1970s, made U.S. goods relatively more expensive to export, and imports relatively cheaper here.

Eckstein said that the most important step the administration and Congress could take to bring the dollar down is to reduce federal budget deficits, that keep interest rates higher than they otherwise would be, attracting foreign investment that pushes the dollar upward.

Democrats' proposals for new governmental action to aid specific industries offer little hope of success unless the underlying economic problems are dealt with, he said.

"No degree of cleverness on the part of management, no new-found cooperation between employers and workers, no industrial policies by the federal government can overcome the handicaps of an overvalued dollar and a domestic economy disrupted by credit crunches and recession every three or four years," the DRI report said.

"The deficit is where the solution has to start," Eckstein said. If the deficit were lowered to 2 percent of the gross national product instead of the present 5 percent level, interest rates would be some 2 percentage points lower and the value of the dollar would drop by 10 percentage points, enough to solve " a very, very large part of the problem," he said.

Eckstein said he believes the DRI study provides the most significant evidence so far that the United States is "de-industrializing"—going through a damaging erosion of its manufacturing base.

Other economists have attacked that view, including Thomas DiLorenzo, in a study published this month by the Heritage Foundation, which argues that industrial production has resumed its growth following the 1981-'82 recession, as it has following each of the previous economic downturns.

"The nation's industrial capacity is not declining, it is growing and changing," said DiLorenzo, adding that "market forces must be permitted to redirect resources to their uses of highest value."

The DRI report documents that change—a massive shift in industrial activity during the past decade, with some big gainers and big losers: Production of electronic components rose 129 percent, plastic products were up 125 percent, and office equipment rose 87 percent; cotton fabrics and leather each declined 25 percent, and steel fell 16 percent.

Eckstein and the DRI report contend that these changes are not merely the work of an efficient market, but the consequence of specific policies that are taking a heavy toll of basic manufacturing industry.

"Economists believe in markets, and the markets seem to be saying 'there is a drift toward services, so why fight it,'" Eckstein said.

He says the reason is that manufacturing is critical to strong economic growth. The DRI report offers suggestive" evidence—although no conclusvie proof" of this. One DRI analsis shows that, in high-growth countries such as Japan, manufacturing has a rising share of overall economic activity, while in the United States, where manufacturing has had a declining share of the economiy, overall economic growth per capita also is relatively low compared with other industrial nations.

"While a country can pour a virtually unlimited amount of capital into investment in services by providing ever more modern office building, bank branches, hotels, shoping malls, etc., these types of investments have lesser growth potential than investment in successful manufactuirng industry," the DRI report said.

Although U.S. investment in manufacturing has been relatively constant since 1966, it is far behind Japan's commitment, and there is a domino effect in that, DRI said.

"There is an enormous advantage in being the number one firm, in possessing the largest market share, the lowest costs, the market power, and the ability to finance technological and product progress. Once the lead is lost, profitability diminishes, resources shrink, and management is pressed into shortsighted, defensive cost-cutting moves that soon produce a further loss of market share," the report said.

WHAT IS CONGRESS DOING?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I am just going to take a little while today and talk some about the legislative schedule of this week, and perhaps a little bit about what could be done and some things about what should be done.

Here we are, on the first day of this week's legislative session. We are 45 minutes into the day and essentially all legislative business for this day has been completed; 45 minutes of session on this day that will be counted as one of the legislative days of the session. It is one of those days that will be referred back to later on in the session, when we are asking why we cannot take up legislation, we will be told that we are much too busy to be taking up items late in the session.

I think we need to point back to this kind of day and say, "Here was a day when we had a total of several hours that could have been devoted to pursuing the agenda of the American people and, instead, we closed up and went home."

I think the American people can legitimately ask, "What is Congress doing?" What is that we are really all about, if we are going to end up spending our time on small bills, closing up session, and not acting on things like the problem of the budget, the problems of social issues such voluntary school prayer, the whole issue of whether or not the executive ought to have some ability to help solve budget deficits with items like the line-item veto?

As of tomorrow, on this House floor, it will be a 10th anniversary. It will be the 10th straight legislative day when those of us on the minority side have asked for the balanced budget amendment to be brought to the floor, have asked for the voluntary school prayer amendment to be brought to the floor, and have asked for the line-item veto to be brought to the floor. It will be 10 straight days in which the Democratic leadership of this Congress will have said no to that agenda, even though we are doing practically nothing on this floor of substance otherwise.

That is the question that the American people can legitimately ask: Why do we have schedules that hardly fill one page for an entire week, and yet we cannot get to the things that are really on the minds of the American people.

Like many of the Members, I was back home again this weekend, and back home again this weekend people were asking me again, "What are you guys doing about the deficit?" The answer is, of course, nothing. The answer is, we are screaming a lot about it, we are talking a lot about the President's deficits in Congress, but we who are responsible, we who article I of the Constitution makes responsible for spending, who are responsible for budgets, we are doing nothing. We are not acting on this floor, and the American people know that we are not acting on this floor on those items of major importance.

We could have, by the end of the week, a resolution on another matter that is of intense concern to the American people, the issue of Lebanon. Once again people are concerned about that issue. They want something meaningful done. They want it resolved. But I question whether or not they are really going to approve of the kind of resolution that has thus far been debated in the Democratic Caucus and evidently now has run into trouble even within the caucus itself because essentially it is a cut-and-run resolution.

I say that as somebody who did not vote for what I regarded as a stupid policy when we adopted the 18-month resolution a while back. I did not vote for that resolution because I thought it was bad policy at that time. I thought it was bad policy because it sent precisely the wrong signal to both our friends and our enemies in the Middle East. It sent a signal to our friends that they had 18 months in which to try to get something worked out, and I think it sent them the signal that caused them to fool around for too long in making some of the decisions that were necessary to move things forward.

But it also sent a signal to our enemies, and that is, if they could force us out in less than 18 months, they have, in fact, achieved a victory in the Middle East over the United States. It is hardly surprising that very soon after that 18-month resolution was passed was when the terrorist attack took place on our marines. That is not surprising, because the terrorists knew at that point that they had a timeframe which would be judged in the world as to whether or not the United States was being defeated or was being victorious in the Middle East.

So it was a wrong policy. It was a bad policy. I did not vote for it at that point. I am sorry so many of my colleagues did. But having made that decision, what kind of a signal does it send to the world then a few months later to decide politically that what we are going to do is cut and run, that we basically going to have Congress declare surrender and move out?

What kind of signal is that to the young men who have already lost their lives in the Middle East and to the families of those young men? What kind of policy is it that this Congress is undertaking when we make those kinds of decisions, that we cannot even stick with a policy that we forced upon the President for a 4-month period? We said 18 months last fall, and now we are saying, "Well, no, that was a bad idea. We're going to change policies all over again."

But that is the kind of resolution that is going to be brought to this floor on Lebanon, a wholly politically partisan resolution aimed at one thing, and that is telling the American people that we thought we were doing something. Now, of course, it has no force of law. The President can decide whether he is going to obey it or not, so it is simply so many words, and it is simply an attempt to react politically to what they perceive as being a political issue.

I suggest that it is a national issue that should be well above politics, and that kind of partisan shenanigans, that kind of making decisions at a Democratic Caucus that they then are determined to bring to the floor and jam down the throats of our Congress is not in the best interests of our foreign policy and certainly not in the best interests of our Nation.

But that is the kind of thing that we are likely to get out here late on this week as a substantive bill to do something about Lebanon. The fact is that any time we want to do something substantive about Lebanon, all we have got to do is cut off the funding. That resolution does not propose cutting off the funding. It is simply a political talk piece and nothing more.

We are going to have a series of other bills out here, first, regarding Presidential certifications on conditions in El Salvador, and that, of course, is legislation that we acted on in the last Congress which the President vetoed. We are evidently going to bring that back to the floor here and try to stir things up in Central America a little.

We are going to bring out a bill on Rotation of Chairmen to the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe. That is a piece of major legislation that I would guess is probably going to entail hours upon hours of debate on the House floor. Of course, it is being brought out under suspension, so we can only have 40 minutes of debate. But it is a very controversial matter, and I say that, of course, with tongue in cheek.

And then, the sense of Congress regarding self-determination of the Baltic States. That is another very, very major piece of legislation, of course, which we will certainly want to debate intently. It is one which we certainly should be passing. But to put that on the legislative schedule here as an item of major point in the legislative schedule makes very little sense.

We are going to be dealing with the construction work in progress bill. Many people think that is one we are doing politically here in the House. It has no chance of going anywhere at any time, but nevertheless we will do it.

And we are also going to be doing the Environmental Research, Development and Demonstration Act, which is subject to a rule being granted. I would guess that we will probably get to that particular bill, but the question is, of course, whether or not this will entail very much debate. I kind of doubt it. It seems like a pretty innocuous kind of bill.

That is the entire schedule here beyond what we have done today, and we do not have a schedule which, it seems to me is aimed at addressing those things that the American people feel very strongly this Congress should be facing up to. It is a very short schedule. It means that we are going to be working short days around here in order to try to fool the American people into believing that something is really going on in the Congress.

The fact is that something should be going on in the Congress. We really ought to be developing and debating some of the issues, but is is certainly not happening with the schedule that we have had for the first week, the second week, and now the third week. I would certainly hope we will see something more substantive emerge in the schedule in the weeks ahead.

The one thing I think the people should be aware of that is likely to happen out here this week is that it is our understanding some of the Democrats are becoming concerned about the repetitive asking for the American people's agenda to be brought up, and they are particularly concerned about the fact that last week some of the budget-busters on their side were actually named by name on the House floor, and there is some talk that within this week we may get them coming to the floor suggesting that some of us who voted for defense in the past are actually the real budget-busters. So we are likely to have some confrontation over the that point. I would suggest that we would want to watch very carefully and see who comes out and says those kinds of things on the floor.

In reviewing the record over the weekend, I found that several of the Members who have raised the strongest objections on that in the last year voted for no defense whatsoever. On defense appropriations and authorizations, what they voted to do in this country was to have no defense at all. They did not vote for anything in terms of spending for defense.

Now, I suggest that there may be some debate over how strong our defense should be and how many weapons systems we really want to buy and how big a troop component we want to have, but I would suggest that those Democrats who voted for absolutely no defense whatsoever are not in tune with the American people or in tune with reality. The suggestion that we could get along with absolutely no defense in this country is ludicrous. We actually have people who are talking the defense issue right now who, when they are casting votes in this Congress, are casting votes for no defense whatsoever, no spending, not one dime for defense.

Some of them are also casting a vote which says that what they want to do is cut back on defense, that somehow the defense spending is far too high at the present time. I think that there is some need, in my personal opinion, for finding places to trim our defense budget, but I would suggest that from some of the Democrats it makes very, very little sense, compared to what they were saying back during the time of the Carter administration.

This year's defense budget, the fiscal 1985 defense budget, submitted by President Reagan for fiscal 1985 is $2.5 billion higher than Jimmy Carter's projected spending for defense when he submitted his budget in January 1981. There has been a total added by this President for fiscal 1985 of $2.5 billion. In other words, if we are going to do as the Democrats are suggesting to us, we are going to deal with the deficit by cutting defense and by raising taxes.

Let us take what that means in terms of the language that we have heard. We would assume that they would not want to cut back any further than the Jimmy Carter defense budget. Let us remember what Jimmy Carter's defense budget gave us: Burning helicopters in the middle of the Iranian desert. That is symbolic of the military during Jimmy Carter's regime. That is the kind of military policy the American people said was totally unacceptable, that this has become an indefensible country in many ways as a result of those kinds of defense policies. So we assume they would not want to go any lower than the Jimmy Carter's figures.

So they can save $2.5 billion if we go back to the Carter figures in defense. All right. Now, that leaves us with $177.5 billion of deficit yet to solve in this year. If they were determined to balance the budget—we have had an awful lot of them coming out here and talking about balancing the budget this year in recent weeks—if they were really determined to balance the budget this year, in order to get $177 billion in new taxes, they would have to confiscate every dime of income in this country above $26,000.

Now, when they talk about taxing the rich, think about that figure. If you are a two-income family and you are earning more than $26,000, how would you like to pay all the taxes you are now paying, plus have every penny of income over $26,000 confiscated from you? In order to balance the budget in the manner the Democrats are talking about, that is what they would have to do. That is the kind of taxation we are talking about.

Now, I do not suggest that anybody making $26,000 or any two-income family in this country is rich, and I do not think many of the American people who are in that income category think of themselves as rich. But we would have to confiscate every dime of income over $26,000, and all those union families out there who have finally gotten themselves into a middle-class status in this country would literally have that middle-class status taxed away from them by the kinds of policies that are being talked about on the other side.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, let us just put that number into a little bit different perspective.

I have some figures here that refer to median income families' average tax rate. It goes back to 1948 and shows what the average tax was of that family's income. For example, in 1948 it was three-tenths of a percent. It worked its way up to 6 percent in 1958, 8.8 percent in 1970, and up to a high of 10.3 percent in 1981. After the tax cuts, that rate fell to 9.2 percent.

There is a column next to it that says, if you use taxes as the method to solve the problem, you would actually have to raise taxes to 15.9 percent of income. That is a 73-percent increase in the tax on a median income family.

Mr. WALKER. Well, the gentleman's figures are just absolutely incredible, and I think it really brings home the point, that when the Democrats talk about taxing the rich, they are not really talking about the rich. They are talking about the people in this country who work for a living, all of them. The Democrats regard people who work for a living as rich, because that is the only way their figures make any sense.

Now, most people that I talk to would think that if you are talking about $75,000 and above, you might be talking about the wealthy people in this country. That is statistically what we show as being really the upper income people in this country, $75,000 and above. If you confiscate away every dime of their income, if you had confiscatory taxation of them, you would get enough money to run the Federal Government for 14 days and we would have 90 days worth of deficit; so in other words, we are really talking about nonsense when they talk about this business that they are going to tax the rich.

The fact is that they are going to tax everyone and the fact is that not even they have to nerve to come to the floor with a bill that would be confiscatory taxation; in other words, to tax away a 100 percent of everybody's income over $26,000. They are not going to do that.

So in order to get the revenue they need, they have got to go way below $26,000. They have got to go down to $20,000. They have got to go down to $17,000. They have got to go down to $15,000 and most of the tax packages that you have seen come on this House floor that have suggested new taxes, where people are being taxed, they are talking about people of $15,000 and above. Those are the rich.

What I am saying is that that is really virtually the working class of this country that they are talking about.

The term "the rich" becomes an irrelevant term when you look at what they are doing with their tax programs.

What we have got around here is a bunch of greedy special interests who have gotten their hooks into this Congress and are bleeding it dry of the tax money provided by working families and the Democrats are willing to feed the greedy special interests at the expense of the taxpayer.

I do not think as a nation we can afford to allow those patterns to continue.

I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Let me make another point. The gentleman mentioned the $15,000 and $16,000 income level. I have some other information here indicating where a family's money goes. A family of four with a 1971 income of $16,000, what I am going to point out here is what impact taxes have had on how the average family goes about spending their money.

Between the years 1971 and 1981, the taxes on income, this is the income that is left to spend——

Mr. WALKER. This is a $16,000 family?

Mr. MACK. Right, has gone up 56 percent—56 percent increase in tax revenue for that one family.

The impact of that is that the family then has to make a decision about how it spends the balance of its money and we find out that because of that they are spending less money on food, less money on housing, less money on personal care, less money on clothing.

In other words, people should not be fooled that just paying a higher tax does not affect anything else. When you pay higher taxes, when you have less money in your pocket to spend for other things, you have to make choices about where you spend your money; less on housing, less on food, less on clothing.

Mr. WALKER. In other words, the $16,000 family, the family that is working hard every week to bring home an average paycheck in this country is virtually having to cut out the necessities of life in order to pay the taxes that the Federal Government charges, is what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. MACK. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER. Then that family finds itself unable to send their children to college, which they would like to do; they find themselves unable to do a lot of the meaningful things of life, because they are certainly not able to afford it, principally because what we are doing is overtaxing them. When you turn-back tax revenue, you are turning it back to those average families, you are then giving them a little bit more money to buy some necessities of life, a little bit more money to do meaningful things in life and a little bit more money to provide their children with a good education. That is what you are really talking about.

Now, when you turn that around and you suggest that more taxes are good for the economy and good for this Government and good for the Nation, then you are really suggesting that that family ought to give up more of the necessities of life, they ought to totally obliterate any chance of having a meaningful life and they ought to give up any chance of educating their children themselves.

Mr. MACK. Well, the reality of what the gentleman is talking about is that through the tax system, you are transferring those items of life that the gentleman mentioned to someone else through the tax system.

Mr. WALKER. And, of course, what has happened around here is the way we have appealed to greedy special interest power around here, we have made certain that that transfer either takes place to people who are unwilling to work, the nonworking people; the working people are transferring money to people who are not willing to work, or they are transferring it to the rich who already have plenty of tax breaks and so on at their disposal. Those are the greedy special interests that have come in here and bled the tax base of this country dry at the expense of working people. That is what we cannot afford to do any longer and yet that is the solution, that is the deficit solution being offered by the liberal side of this Congress.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Let us move on to another point, because again we have indicated how the higher taxes, if that was the method used to solve the deficit problem, how this higher taxes affect how families spend their money.

It also affects how they save or invest money and when you start comparing the United States to other developed countries, for example, Japan, you find that Japan has an average investment of 32.1 percent of GNP, whereas in the United States it is 18.3.

The suggestion that I am making is that our taxing polices affect how we as a nation invest and save our funds.

I will make one additional point. Government spending as a percentage of GNP in Japan is 9.7 percent. In the United States, as of this particular date, it is 18.1 percent. We know that has gone up to about 25 or 26 percent now.

Those have significant impacts on how we as a country save and how we invest.

Mr. WALKER. Well, the gentleman makes an excellent point, because we have to take that, of course, one step further. It is the savings and the investment that make it possible to create new jobs. The 4 million new jobs that we have created over the last several months have been because we have been willing to save more and invest more in our economy and that is because we got a little bit of a tax cut and we were able to boost that up a little bit; but we are not going to be able to create new jobs, we are not going to be able to have a future for working people in this Nation if we tax it all away, because the one thing that Congress has proven itself inept at is creating jobs. We keep talking about jobs related bills around here; but the fact is that we do not create jobs. The economy has to create real meaningful productive work itself and that relies upon savings and investment; so the gentleman is absolutely right. When you tax away the ability to save and invest, you are taxing away the ability to create new jobs and you are insuring that the long-term future employment in this country is bleak.

While the deficits certainly matter, it matters also how you solve the deficits, because solving the deficits with additional taxes will not produce more jobs. It will produce less jobs. Solving the deficits by reducing spending creates more jobs for the future, because it insures a savings and investment climate in which jobs can come about.

I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

OUR ROLE IN LEBANON

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the American people, those that are watching and listening, will bear with me through this time, because I think what we are dealing with is one of the most important political issues—I emphasize the word political issues—that likely ever faced this Chamber in the last several years. There has been much rhetoric talking about foreign policy. Most of that rhetoric has centered around the Middle East and more specifically, Lebanon, and our role in Lebanon. Ever since the tragic bombing of the Embassy in Beirut which killed 33 American and the further tragedy of over 251 American marines died in another suicide or kami-kazi car bombing, needless to say, every headline of most every newspaper, the top story on the television and radio stations across the country focuses and centers around the crisis in Lebanon and just what our role in Lebanon as a country ought to be.

I do not think there is a Member of this House that supports marines staying in Lebanon for a long-term period. In fact, I am sure every one of us——

PERMISSION TO FILE CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 1340, REHABILITATION AMENDMENTS OF 1983

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers may have until midnight tonight to file a conference report on the Senate bill (S. 1340) to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and to extend the Developmental Disability Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WALKER. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves the right to object.

Mr. WALKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding this has been cleared by the minority side and that it is possible to have it cleared.

My problem, though, it seems to me that this is not the time that we are supposed to be doing this. I thought under the understanding that we have with the Chair, that when we got to special orders that we were not going to have a substantive business intervene.

Is that a misunderstanding on my part? I just want to clarify where we are.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me answer the gentleman by stating that I understand that some of the Senators are not back in town and I did not know anything about it until 10 minutes ago. We wanted to bring the conference report up on Thursday. Therefore, we had to make the unanimous-consent request at this time, and I wanted, and I mentioned it to the gentleman as I came in, I know there is no objection, but I wanted to clear it with the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman. As I say, it is my understanding that there is no objection to the substance of what the gentleman is doing.

The problem is, though, that we have had some wrangles out here about the whole business of procedure, and the time, and who was going to get permitted time, and a lot of these kinds of things. In essence, what I am doing is protecting us a little bit, because once we set the precedent of doing this, what I find is we get rulings later on saying "Oh, yes, this has been done before, so do not worry too much about it."

Mr. PERKINS. Let me say to the gentleman that unless it is some type of emergency, I will not make a request like this in the future. But I understand the agreement is calling up the report. In this instance we are only asking unanimous consent to file the report.

Mr. WALKER. Further reserving the right to object, I would simply ask the Chair whether or not that is the basis of the understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair's understanding is that the Speaker's statement dealt with calling up legislation, not filing a report. That is my understanding.

Mr. WALKER. So we do have a precedent, then, that we can file conference reports during the special order time, that that is going to be permitted, that kind of business is going to be permitted during special order time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The filing of a conference report can be done at any time as a matter of right before the House, before the House adjourns.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is simply, under my reservation of right to object, is simply trying to find out just where we stand on all of these rulings that we had thrown at us over the last couple of weeks, and I am trying to make certain I have an understanding of how we are operating here, and that is my only concern.

On the substance of the gentleman's request, I understand that has been cleared and there is no problem. I am simply trying to clarify what we are all about here.

Is it now my understanding that filing conference reports will be one of those items of business always permitted under special orders, under the time allotted for special orders?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has always been the practice of the House and is still the practice of the House.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the Speaker and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. SILJANDER. As I was saying, dealing with the issue of Lebanon, which obviously has garnered the attention of the American people, every interest group, every politician from one coast to the other, and every media conceivable to man worldwide, the issue certainly centers around what our role ought to be in Lebanon.

As I was saying before, I do not think there is one Member of Congress who desires the marines to be in Lebanon. I do not think there is one Member of Congress who would not want the marines to have an orderly, safe withdrawal, as soon as humanly possible.

No one is overjoyed by the fact that the marines are in Lebanon.

This is not a game, Mr. Speaker. I say to the Members and the American people who are listening: this is not a game in Lebanon and in the Middle East. It is life and death. It is an issue that concerns all of us very greatly.

There are three concerns I have with the House joint resolution recently endorsed by the Democratic Caucus, now before the Foreign Affairs Committee, of which I am a member. There are three basic concerns.

The first one is the political partisan nature of the resolution. The second issue is the misguided direction and just incorrect information given within this extensive resolution as a document. Third, the serious implications of this document and that this document makes to our foreign policy as a nation, our objectives for peace in the Middle East.

I would like to first deal with the political nature of this document. It is rare, it is rare that I have ever seen in the Foreign Affairs Committee, one of high stature and reputation, that there has ever been a document that has come out of that committee so blatantly partisan, political, and vindictive against any administration, be it either Republican or Democrat. I had hoped as a member, newer member of that committee that I had joined a committee that had integrity, a committee that had vision for fairness, Mr. Speaker, not one of bias and partisanality.

I would like to read a quote from October 27, 1983, the Washington Post, of our Honorable Speaker, THOMAS O'NEILL. He was rebuking at that time the liberal Democrats and he shouted at the Democrat Party that "We should put patriotism above partisanship and back President Reagan," he said.

The Post goes on to say that Speaker O'NEILL took the occasion to shout his contempt for the Democrats who, quoting now Mr. O'NEILL, "try to make this a partisan issue."

He is agreeing with Reagan, O'NEILL said, because "I am a patriot."

Mr. Speaker, not too long after that October 27 statement President Reagan announced his intention to run for office as President of the United States for a second term, and not too long after that the Speaker endorsed Walter Mondale for President of the United States. And he said, quoting Mr. O'NEILL again, that "I will do everything I can to see that he is elected."

Considering all of those quotes formerly by the Speaker about putting patriotism above partisanship, and he says we should support the President's program in Lebanon because it is patriotic, I would like to read to you several quotations of the Democrat-sponsored resolution asking for immediate withdrawal of the Marines out of Lebanon.

Again, the main point I am trying to make is not whether we should have marines in or out of Lebanon, or even when we should or should not have them withdrawn. My point simpy is very clearly that this document, as introduced initially in the Foreign Affairs Committee—how it will change I cannot respond—but how it has been presently presented is incredibly biased, incredibly partisan, and looks more as though it is a document or a white paper against President Reagan sponsored at a Democratic rally, not by a bipartisan Foreign Affairs Committee.

For example, a couple of quotes to illustrate the partisanality of the resolution:

The President has been unable to present convincing rationale for continued participation by the United States Armed Forces in the MNF.

The situation in Lebanon has deteriorated in recent months.

It has been deteriorating for the last decade.

The expansion of the United States military role * * * . There is an urgent need, therefore, for reassessment of alternative means.

There is a failure of the administration to adequately reexamine its policy.

Another section—

despite the lack of realistic United States policy in the confusion about their mission.

Going on to another section—

To promote progress toward a peaceful resolution of the country's problems requires a United States policy which gives higher priority to diplomatic and political solution.

Going to another section—

The situation in Lebanon is drifting out of control and the administration's policy regarding Lebanon is not working.

The United States—

The resolution goes on to say—is reacting to events rather than implementing policies.

It also says—

The administration has failed to impress upon the Government of Lebanon the urgent need for it to develop a viable reconciliation plan.

Mr. Speaker, I do not need to go on and on with this, but it does say in several more points about the failure of the administration to do this, the failure of the administration to do that.

Well, who is the administration? President Reagan.

Who drafted the document? The Democratic Caucus.

It that is their party platform, Mr. Speaker, that is fine. It ought to be a partisan platform. But to be introduced as a document such as this consistently condemning, attacking a policy, is not the appropriate way to draft a resolution.

The appropriate way to draft a resolution is to say what you want to say, deal with the issues as they are, as you see them, and set aside partisanality and set aside partisan politics.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Can the gentleman tell me when this was drafted in the Democractic Caucus?

□ 1320

Mr. SILJANDER. It was drafted on February 2.

Mr. WALKER. February 2.

Can the gentleman tell me when it arrived in the Foreign Affairs Committee?

Mr. SILJANDER. Obviously that is another issue that concerns us. We were sitting the very next day, 16 hours after the resolution was drafted, and we were expected to begin hearings, and the second day after that we were to begin markup of the resolution.

Mr. WALKER. In other words a resolution drafted in the Democratic Caucus was sent immediately to the committee?

Mr. SILJANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALKER. Which was brought immediately to the committee and now there is some talk about bringing it to the floor very, very quickly?

In other words, within a week and a half time we are to take up this matter, and there is some chance we may take up this matter on the House floor; is that correct?

Mr. SILJANDER. Yes. But let me go back and tell you as drafted in the morning, that afternoon the committee met with their notification and a copy of the resolution that the very next day there would be hearings, the day following there would be a markup and the following Tuesday, which would be tomorrow, there was to be a vote on the floor of the Congress. That scenario has changed because of obvious furor and obvious outrage of so many of us who consider this such an important issue that we certainly should not have a 16-hour period between observing the resolution and an opportunity then to have a hearing on the resolution.

Mr. FOLEY. In the interest of fairness, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington, yes.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker on the part of the majority party I announced the program on Thursday afternoon of last week and said at that time that there would be no extraordinary means used to bring this resolution to the floor. The gentleman is creating a strawman and then deliberately knocking it down. The fact of the matter is that this resolution is proceeding through the normal course of committee consideration. The gentleman misspoke himself a little while ago in suggesting that the resolution had been reported out. The gentleman knows well that this is not the case. I am equally surprised by his characterization of the resolution as "vicious criticisms." I would be frank to tell the gentleman that I believe the Democratic Party has strained to give bipartisan support to this President, much, much more in fact, than the gentleman on the other side ever gave to the foreign policy of his predecessor.

Time after time in this President's administration Democrats have worked to insure that the U.S. Government spoke with one voice in its foreign policy abroad. I might say to the gentleman that it does a disservice to the cause that he is supporting, the cause of bipartisanship, to suggest that there is a connection here between the position of the Speaker or any Member of this body and the candidacy of Mr. Mondale or any other Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. SILJANDER. Reclaiming my time, if the gentleman does not mind, I never said, I did not mean to imply that the resolution was ever reported out of committee.

Mr. FOLEY. Well, the gentleman should look at the transcript then, so he can correct it.

Mr. SILJANDER. I have the time if the gentleman will excuse me. We were told by the chairman of the committee the same day that the resolution specifically was drafted, we saw no wording until the very day we were advised that the very next day there would be a hearing and the following day markup and likely it would be brought up on the floor the following Tuesday. That was the scenario; that was the scenario. It has thus far changed.

Mr. FOLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. I will not yield.

Mr. FOLEY. That ought to indicate——

Mr. WALKER. Yield to him.

Mr. SILJANDER. I will. But I am very happy that the gentleman has in his wisdom changed that scenario because the timetable that the gentleman from Pennsylvania brought up was I think an unfair timetable for many of us who would like to study the resolution and the implications of the resolution.

One of my staff stayed up the entire evening assuming that the next day would be the hearing on the resolution, stayed up the entire night attempting to draft a section-by-section analysis of it. That should not be a part of fair play in this House.

I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. I will say to the gentleman that if he wants a debate on this issue he can have a debate. He has control of the time for the first 3 hours tonight and can use it to carry on without yielding with statements that I think are gross distortions of the fact and misrepresent the circumstances of both parties.

But if the gentleman does not want to yield for corrections or comment——

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to you.

Mr. FOLEY. You yield to me reluctantly. If you are going to yield for purposes of debate, I will stay here and we can have some debate on this issue. However, if the gentleman, has a point, if he is going to cut me off every time I have a point with the resumption of his own time, then I think this whole evening of special orders can only be viewed as the kind of political activity on your side that you apparently have decided it should be.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

I am sorry the majority whip is so upset here. The gentleman has obviously yielded to him and I think he should, I think we always ought to have a dialog. I was down there for a few minutes myself and I would have been perfectly willing to yield to anybody. I regularly yield to anybody who wants to debate me on these issues.

But I think it somewhat misrepresents the position of the Republican Party with regard to bipartisanship in foreign policy to suggest, as the gentleman from Washington suggested, that the Republicans were not supportive.

As I recall, I was here throughout the whole Iranian crisis, and I do not recall any kind of vicious document of the type of document that came out of the Democratic Caucus the other day, coming out of the Republican Caucus even during the time when most Americans recognized we had an absolutely failed policy.

We were not viciously attacking the President of the United States during that crisis. And in a number of other foreign policy realms.

I would suggest that the Republican Party stuck with Lyndon Johnson more solidly during the Vietnam war than many Democrats stuck with Lyndon Johnson during the Vietnam war.

So that I think that there is a fairly long history of the Republican Party being cooperative on matters of major significance in foreign policy. And I am disappointed by the kind of dialog that the gentleman from Washington brings in here supposedly in the interest of bipartisanship.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GAYDOS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. FOLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. I cannot yield to three people. Allow me to make at least one statement.

I have 60 minutes, not 3 hours. And I assure the other gentlemen who have time, whatever time they may or may not yield to use of. My point of being here to outline as a member of the committee my concern with the document that I, in my opinion, feel is a quite partisan document.

I do not object to the gentleman and his party having his own opinions with regard to their own policies. That is part of the democratic process.

But that document as STEPHEN SOLARZ, a member of the committee, said and felt during the first day that we observed that document, he even admitted himself there were obvious political overtones to the document. And that is why the timetable, as I urgently outlined, as was outlined to me, has been changed to try to address some of those more blatant political notations in the document.

If you feel the marines should have an orderly and immediate withdrawal, I respect your opinion quite highly.

But the other mentions, the political mentions in this document I think are unheard of in terms of the kind of material that has formally come out of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

We have had many controversial documents, including the nuclear freeze. I may not have agreed with some of the documents, but at least they came out in a fair, organized governmental manner without having blatant partisan illusions.

Mr. FOLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman keeps referring to "coming out." The committee has not yet acted, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. SILJANDER. I know.

Mr. FOLEY. So there is nothing that has come out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I think that must be made clear.

Second, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) refers to the original draft as "vicious criticism."

I do not think that anything in that draft can possibly qualify as vicious criticism of the President of the United States or the administration's foreign policy.

It expresses differences which the gentleman suggests he respects the right of any Member to have with the administration's foreign policy. That is all it does. It states some obvious facts, as uncomfortable as they may be for all of us, Democrats and Republicans alike. While I cannot presume to know how the Committee on Foreign Affairs will act on that draft, I do think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania's characterization of it does no service, as I said before, to the bipartisanship that has existed in many administrations on both sides of the aisle. I did not say Republicans did not support the foreign policy of President Carter; I said I thought that this administration had had stronger support from the Democrats on foreign policy than the Republicans gave to Mr. Carter. That is a matter of relevant judgment.

In fact since World War II both parties have striven, in their official leadership at least, to try to find a basis of common support.

What I suggest to the gentleman is that it does help that spirit of commonality in foreign policy to exaggerate with overblown language designed to put a tone of bad motive on legitimate policy disagreements. That kind of approach is not conducive to bipartisanship.

If the gentleman thinks I am a little disturbed, he is correct. I think the gentleman is making a political partisan issue of the whole problem of Lebanon, while attempting to lay the blame for partisanship on the Democrats.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

And I simply made the point—and I would make it again—I do not recall at any point during the Carter administration the Republican Party coming forth with the kind of document that we now have before us, particularly after there had supposedly been a bipartisan job done in order to have 18 months of time during which they would have some kind of a policy implemented in Lebanon.

Now, the only thing that has changed since the time we passed that 18-month resolution, which, as I said earlier here on the floor, I did not agree with that at that point, but the only thing that has changed is politics. And one cannot help thinking that a document drafted in the Democratic Caucus is in fact a political document.

Now the gentleman on the other side may not want to characterize it that way, but when a political caucus drafts a document, one has to regard it as having a taint of politics. And it is hard to consider it otherwise.

Had the document been drafted in the Foreign Affairs Committee and reported to the floor, that might be another issue, but this is a document drafted as a political document within a political caucus.

Mr. SILJANDER. If I may reclaim my time, as a member of the Subcommittee on the Middle East, I offered an advisory sense of the committee the same day that I laid eyes on the resolution that we in that subcommittee would have an opportunity to at least hold one hearing, which I think is fair for a subcommittee on the Middle East concerned with Lebanon, a public hearing on the particular resolution.

It was voted down. Congressman WINN and myself and the two Republicans and the reigning Democrats on the committee voted against it. That began an obvious, in my opinion, partisan attempt to squash any attempt on our side to get more than a couple of hours input on the resolution.

Since then I am happy that the scenario, the timetable for dealing with this resolution has changed. But I will stand by my remarks respectfully to the Democratic whip, that that document, the way it is presented, resembles nothing of the 18-month document which was quite controversial. The 18-month document, whether one was for it or against it, was reported out in legitimate fashion.

This document, and the concern I have, in my opinion, the reason why the timetable has changed because it is so obviously partisan that I think that the Democrat Party and the Republicans pulled back for a moment to reassess the wording of that document, not so much in what the document says in the substance about immediate withdrawal of troops in Lebanon, but, rather, reassessment of the presentation, the way the information has been presented.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

All I can tell the gentleman is I met with thousands of my constituents during December and January in the Fourth Congressional District of Oregon and everywhere I went among working people and business groups, Republicans and Democrats, who came to my town meetings, young and old, high schools, and senior citizen centers, I would ask one question: How many here believe that there is cause for our marines to be in Lebanon and how many here believe that our marines should be in Lebanon?

And it was not a mixed vote. I asked them to raise their hand. I was struck by the fact that it was almost unanimous. As a matter of fact, I do not remember one single hand out of the thousands in these various rooms, schoolrooms, meeting halls, business luncheon groups, not one hand did I ever see go up to say that our marines should be in Lebanon. This was the American people speaking.

And I understand that in the other hundreds of congressional districts throughout the country the situation is much the same, but in my district in Oregon it was unanimous, it was universal. and they did not say, "Well, let's discuss what we are doing there." They said, "We have seen enough. We believe they should be out of there now."

So I was sent back to Congress just a week or so ago by my constituents with an imperative and an immediate delegation to all I could to get the marines out of Lebanon. And I promised my constituents that I would do all I could.

So I was one that went to the leadership of my party here and said, "My people want a resolution brought to the floor as soon as possible. I would hope it could be within the few days after we come back that would say we need prompt and orderly withdrawal."

The language that was drafted by Chairman HAMILTON, who I thought did an excellent job, said exactly that, prompt and orderly withdrawal.

And I said this is something that my constituents want and want it now. They do not want to wait week after week after week while the marines are dying.

Let me just conclude by saying that I saw nothing in this document that Mr. HAMILTON wrote that said other than the President had been unable to make clear to the American people why the marines should be in Lebanon. This certainly was true in my district. The President had not made it clear to them because they unanimously wanted our marines out. And that is all the document says.

I can say this, though, what I read in the Wall Street Journal late last week of what the President said, that to my mind, was something that I do not want to hear in the annals of American politics. The President accused some of us on this side of the aisle of surrender.

Now that is the kind of rhetoric that to my mind is vicious, is partisan. But do not accuse the Democrats when we come up with what our constituents want, very much——

Mr. SILJANDER. I want to indulge in a colloquy on my time, if the gentleman would not mind.

The gentleman's constituents—and I certainly agree that the polls are clear, that the majority of Americans would like to see the marines withdrawn from Lebanon—as I would, too. I do not think that that is really an issue. It is the manner in which the marines are withdrawn from Lebanon.

Let me ask the gentleman, in his opinion, since the gentleman was involved apparently in the request of the gentleman's leadership late last week: What in the gentleman's opinion would be the implications if the marines did have a prompted and orderly withdrawal? Now what prompt means exactly, I am not sure. And how it could be orderly, I am not sure. But beyond that, if the marines were to up and leave—let us not call it surrender, let us not call it turning tail and running—let us just assume the marines got up and left. What does the gentleman think the political implications would be of that?

Mr. WEAVER. The political implications would be very simple. And, by the way, I know of no more orderly body in the world than the U.S. Marines. They are the finest example of orderliness I know and I know that whatever they do it is going to be done orderly.

But the implications of that would be very simple. In the words of the Speaker of the House, the world would realize that we got smart and got our marines out of an untenable position.

Mr. SILJANDER. Now what would the implications be in Lebanon? What would occur, does the gentleman think, after the departure of the U.S. Marines to the rest of our friends, the multinational force?

Mr. WEAVER. I respond to the gentleman by simply saying: What does the gentleman think is happening in Lebanon today? It is deteriorating with the Marines there and under threat every day to death. It is deteriorating rapidly. The government is falling apart.

Mr. SILJANDER. Does the gentleman feel that if we left it would deteriorate that much further?

Mr. WEAVER. Oh, I cannot see how it could possibly deteriorate worse. I cannot imagine how it could be worse. But I know this, not one more marine would die in Lebanon. And the horror of a possible superpower confrontation would no longer be there.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, the concern I have is that when I asked the question to many of my fellow colleagues on both sides of the aisle who demand immediate withdrawal of the marines out of Lebanon, I asked them what would the followup be. And the followup of course is disorder because there is so much disorder there now.

But I might point out for the first time in almost a decade that almost all of the major factions in Lebanon have agreed to reconciliation. The army, they have agreed to the Shiite, the Sunni, and the Moslem splits in the army. They have agreed through the splits in their assembly.

I believe that there has been progress made through all the maze, and the smoke and the shelling, still even as the Post reporter said in Sunday's Post, there is still some semblance of order, at least some semblance of order behind the scenes in negotiation.

I do not think the Lebanese people want to carry on another decade of turmoil. I do not believe that the Lebanese people, be they Shiites, Sunni, or Phalangist Christians, care to continue with the shelling, the death and the slaughter of their country. The only semblance of order has been in fact our Marines in Lebanon. The only semblance of order in that country over the last decade has in fact been the presence of the multinational force in Lebanon.

What concerns me more than anything else is the direct implications if we leave. Syria will come in, supported by the Soviet Union, there will be a flood of the Syrians, undoubtedly Lebanon will no longer be Lebanon but part of the Greater Syria, as the Syrians call it, and radical Islamic forces in the Middle East will again regain control of that region. And what is next? Jordan is part of a Greater Syria; Saudi Arabia has very little army, great deal finances but very little defense; Egypt is concerned. All of the moderate area Arab countries are concerned.

The Persian Gulf is at stake. What about the security of Israel? Do you think the Israelis are supporting the immediate withdrawal of the multinational force? Obviously, they do not.

I think Amin Gemayel said it best. He said, "If the Americans go and I go, the Syrians will be right behind me."

And I think that is fairly pointed, in terms of what will in fact happen if we immediately withdraw.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, there are two points made by the gentleman from Oregon that I think deserve a little bit of attention. First, I was pleased with his reference to the Marine Corps. They are probably the finest fighting force in the world. In large part, that is because they are also one of the few military units in the world with the kind of esprit de corps that the Marines have always shown. To ask the Marines to cut and run would do more to undermine that esprit de corps than nearly any other action we could take.

Second, it seems to me that to make a reference to what is taking place today in Lebanon on this floor is somewhat tragic. We cannot escape the responsibility that those things that we have been saying and doing in this country over the last few days, which appear to be a United States backing off from our commitment in that area of the world, are certainly going to have implications. That is certainly going to encourage the terrorists there to believe that even though the cabinet resigned and even though the government there has announced that it is willing to put all things on the table, that the radicals there now decided to attack. Why? Because they believe at this point that anarchy serves them best and that the United States, in the face of that anarchy, is likely to have an even greater attitude toward withdrawal.

I think that some of what is taking place in Lebanon today can be ascribed to the policies that have been enunciated in this House by leaders, who in my opinion should have known better, over the last few days.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Pennsylvania also like to ascribe the deterioration of conditions in Lebanon to outstanding Republican Members who have taken a similar position?

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield, I would say to the gentleman that I would ascribe it to all people who have said that——

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman's remarks were very pointed. The gentleman indicated that he thought that the leadership on the Democratic side had contributed to the deterioration in Lebanon.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made no reference to Democrats. I said that there had been a number of statements in recent days——

Mr. FOLEY. By leaders of the House.

Mr. WALKER. No; I said "by leaders." The gentleman is saying that that is strictly Democrats.

Mr. FOLEY. I am glad that the gentleman has provided that clarification.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman continue to yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has simply pointed out that I did not agree with the leadership on your side and the leadership on my side when they gave us the 18-month resolution. I voted against that. I thought that was a lousy policy, and I think it has been proven to be a lousy policy.

But now, to compound that lousy policy with one that has even a greater stench to it seems to me is really carrying the House into a situation and is leading to precisely the kind of anarchy that presents itself in the——

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman will yield to me, I want to caution the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is not in the interest of proper debate and bipartisanship in foreign policy to try to ascribe the deterioration of events in Lebanon to those who have merely been conscious of it and have raised the question, as the gentleman himself did, of the wisdom of the continued presence of our Marine detachment.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. When the gentleman from Washington finishes his point, then I will yield.

Mr. FOLEY. May I have an opportunity to finish the point?

Mr. SILJANDER. Yes.

Mr. FOLEY. It seems to me that it comes with ill grace when those who ask for debate on domestic and foreign policy issues are quick to cite the very fact of debate as causing the deterioration of conditions around the world we all deplore.

It does not seem to me to be wise to refer to any comment on the administration's foreign policy as vicious criticism. I defy them to find one word in the resolution that was reported to the Democratic Caucus which is vicious. There may be areas that one might disagree with. Indeed, there is disagreement on our side, as well as on yours. However, it is not vicious or ferocious criticism. It attacks neither the motives nor personality of the President or anybody in this administration. To stand in the well of the House, as the gentleman, with the support of his colleague from Pennsylvania has done—and suggest that this is a vicious document of criticism is simply unfair and, worse, untrue.

I think it ought to be retracted from the RECORD before this debate proceeds any further. If the gentleman has any examples of viciousness, he certainly did not read them when he described parts of the resolution.

Mr. SILJANDER. Reclaiming my time, I think the gentleman is confusing comments from one person to the other and back and forth. I think that in itself is, frankly, unfair. I simply made the point that my opinion—if the gentleman does not mind respecting my opinion—and I think the opinion of several of your own colleagues on your side of the aisle that were quoted during the hearing on this particular issue in the committee meeting, that this document does smack of partisan politics.

Now, whether someone calls it vicious, or I might call them unwarranted comments, unnecessary comments, those that I feel are not symbolic of the nobility of the Foreign Affairs Committee reporting out resolutions, a point, not personality, I particularly feel, and I think it is substantiated by many of the comments and substantiated by the fact that many people in this Congress decided to change the agenda, the time under the agenda, to reevaluate the approach.

I am criticizing not only the content, which is a fair debate, but I am criticizing also the approach in which this resolution has taken, the timetable of the resolution initially, which I objected to as a member of the subcommittee which never had an opportunity to hear it, and also a member of the full committee in which we had 16 hours between the time the document was laid before our eyes and the time we had the first hearing on it. That is what I am objecting to—the approach and the timetable.

The other points I would like to make—and obviously my time is wearing out to use for the record—are on the specifics of the proposal, which have nothing to do with partisan politics. It has to do with simply an honest debate on foreign policy.

So I hope the gentleman will understand——

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman will yield to me, I do not have any objection——

Mr. SILJANDER. I do not think I yield. I hope the gentleman will understand that my comments are not meant to suggest that you or Mr. O'NEILL or your party are vicious. I am simply telling you that it is pretty blatantly obvious for any objective observer reading this resolution that it does smack with political overtones.

Now, you can infer whatever you want from that.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the debate has called our attention to a couple of other things. It seems rather strange to me that when we criticize in somewhat harsh terms a document drafted in the Democratic Caucus, that that becomes a terrible thing to do and that kind of disagreement is not permitted. It also seems to me to be awfully strange, coming from the party that has described cuts in the rates of growth of budgets, and so on, as being vicious and cruel, and has been perfectly willing to attack the President personally. The Speaker of this House at one point said that the President was a man who was basically against—I have forgotten the exact words—well, insensitive, and it was even against the Bible or God or something, and so on, that people even voted for the man. So I think we have had a history of the disagreements coming from that side of the aisle of being couched in that kind of terminology, so that when they protest, they protest a little bit too much, given the record of the last 2 or 3 years.

I would also say to the gentleman that we also are concerned with the fact that this became a very partisan political kind of thing, as the gentleman has pointed out, that this did not start in any kind of a bipartisan spirit. This started as a partisan political move within this House, and that is really the major concern that we have with the kinds of policies that are being developed.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I will yield in one moment.

My point has been fairness above all other things. There are three points I wanted to make this afternoon. One was the fairness of the issue; the second was the substance of the resolution; and third, the implications of the resolution over our foreign policy.

I must say that I have yielded to the gentleman on the other side of the aisle with full willingness to listen to their objections to my comments, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, although it is my time, not the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he, as you, are more than willing and able to articulate your concerns with my statements or any other policies that are presented before this country.

But I do feel that this is an important issue, and I do feel that the approach by which it was taken by the leadership of the other side of the aisle was inappropriate. I did not call it vicious. I simply said it was inappropriate. If that is too harsh a word for the gentleman, I am very, very sorry.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I do not object to the word "inappropriate" or any other words that express a disagreement with the policy, but several times during the dialog here, either the gentleman in the well or the gentleman from Pennsylvania has, I believe, used the word "vicious," and that is, in my judgment, an inappropriate word in light of the fact that nothing in the resolution, even as originally introduced to the Democratic Caucus, contains any such language.

The reason I came into the well was to correct the record, because I think most Americans, not having the document before them, would perhaps accept the gentleman's comment that there was some vicious criticism. There is nothing that can be construed as vicious or corrosive or personal criticism in the document that was introduced in the Democratic Caucus.

I might also say that this is not the only time people in the Congress have spoken out against the positioning of American marines in Lebanon. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself pointed out, there were many on both sides of the aisle who disagreed with the original suggestion of supporting the administration's 18-month request. That does not constitute trying to bring down the policy of the administration; it is a disagreement in good faith on the issues that were involved.

Secondly, I would point out that in recent weeks, and even in recent days, prominent leaders—and I will use the gentleman's word—in both parties and in both bodies of Congress have called for the with drawal of the American marines from Lebanon. While this may be a matter of disagreement, it is neither appropriate nor true, as the gentleman would have us believe, because the turmoil being felt in Lebanon today within the army, within the cabinet, within the political life of the country, is the result of a debate in the House of Representatives or in the Senate.

There is no justification for the suggestion that the deterioration of events in recent weeks is the result of any actions, lack of action or statements that have been made by anybody in the United States. They are the result of internal problems in Lebanon, and there should be no doubt about that.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, regaining my time, because I only have about 10 more minutes left, and the gentleman has used, frankly, as much as I have on my own special order——

Mr. FOLEY. I will be glad to reciprocate to the gentleman.

Mr. SILJANDER. That may be the gentleman's opinion, that events in this Congress have no direct correlation to foreign policy and what happens and occurs in foreign countries overseas, but I would submit to the gentleman that what happened recently in Beirut, some of the heaviest shelling in recent years, one shell or mortar every 3 seconds, certainly is indicative of a major offensive on the part of some of the radical Islamic forces in that country. I think it is just rather coincidental that that happened to happen not long after a major front-page news headlines that the Congress is calling for immediate withdrawal of troops from Lebanon.

Now, if there is a correlation, I leave that up to the American people to decide whether or not there is a correlation between the two, but I think it is pretty obvious that what we do in this House, what we do in the various committees of this Chamber, does have a dramatic impact, whether we want to feel that way or not, on our foreign policy overseas.

I went on a European parliament trip just several weeks ago. Every leader told us that what we say and what we do is so vastly important to them in Europe and to North Africa because they attempt to read between the lines of what we are saying on the floor of this Congress, what we are saying in the committees of this Congress, and any time we pass a resolution or even have an implication that we may or are considering a resolution or a bill affecting foreign policy of any major dimension, it does send signals, shock waves, if you will, across the world that is read and often misinterpreted by others across the seas.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate carefully today, and I can conclude only that you and the gentleman from Pennsylvania are trying to suggest that somehow the Democratic leadership in Congress is trying to make a partisan issue of the situation in Lebanon.

I want to remind the gentleman in the well, and also the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there have been senior Members of their body in this body and the other body who have been critical of the role of the marines in Lebanon at the same time that the Speaker of the House was very strongly supporting the President's role in putting those marines in Lebanon.

I think the most important point that needs to be made here is that this is not a partisan issue. People on both sides of the political aisle have been both supportive and critical of the role of the marines in Lebanon.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania said nothing has changed since the 18-month resolution was passed in the House. Only Rip Van Winkle could say that. A lot has changed. A great deal has changed since the House passed that 18-month resolution, and people on both sides of the political aisle are coming back from the town meetings they have held, and from the constituents they have visited with, understanding that even more American people are beginning to question why are those marines in Lebanon and to question whether that policy should not change.

This is the body where we raise those questions, and doing so does not make it partisan. Frankly, I do not like the kind of discussion I hear today, suggesting that because we want to discuss, our policy on Lebanon, whether Democrats and Republicans, it smacks of some political diatribe against the policies of the President of the United States. I think that is nonsense.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, reclaiming my time, if the gentleman were to read other resolutions dealing with the whole array of issues, including the 18-month resolution, which I did vote for, I do not think he would see a resolution that quite has the implications of political overtones and the attacking of any particular policy that this one, particularly, has time and time again.

My concern has been and still is the fairness question; whether or not there is ample opportunity, once the document was presented before us in committee, from that time to the time we were expected to vote on that document at least initially, and the way the document was prepared, my concern was strictly fairness.

I agree with the gentleman. When I go home to my district, I hear the same things; that the people of Michigan, the Fourth District of Michigan, want the marines out, too. I want the marines out as soon as possible, but I am also concerned with the life and freedom and reconciliation and at least a glimmer of hope bringing all the factions together for discussion. I have at least a glimmer of hope and optimism; while it might be squelched out in many other people's minds, I have a glimmer of hope and optimism.

I did present a plan to Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. McFarlane and the White House, my Democratic and Republican colleagues alike. I, too, feel the marines need to be at least redeployed to some degree. I have not disagreed with that. I offered to the Democrats in the committee a middle ground, rather than taking up and running, or just staying there and not doing anything.

Mr. DORGAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SILJANDER. Let me make my point on my time, if I may.

My position has been as long as we have now trained 5 brigades of Lebanese forces, 1 additional being trained by the French, 2 more U.S.-trained brigades by the end of 60 days, 10 by midyear, why do we not have a phased redeployment as the troop strength builds with the Lebanese forces. Then we can begin a slow, phased redeployment without jeopardizing our commitment or going back on our commitment to the Lebanese Government one iota. We can phase the withdrawal of marines from land and on board ships off the coast of the Mediterranean.

Mr. DORGAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota first for 1 minute.

Mr. DORGAN. Does the gentleman agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that nothing has changed in Lebanon since the vote on the 18 months?

Mr. SILJANDER. I do not agree with that statement; no.

Mr. DORGAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SILJANDER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one point. I did not say that. I said the policy has not changed in that time. I did not say nothing has changed in Lebanon, and it is important that we make these distinctions because one of the things that is being done here on the floor is that the Democrats are attempting to suggest to the gentleman and to me that somehow we are preventing disagreement with the policy. Nothing of the kind is being done here.

Anybody has the right to disagree with policy, and so on, and I think this kind of debate is healthy. What we are disagreeing with is that you ought not be writing foreign policy options in the Democratic Caucus. That makes it partisan political whether they like it or not.

Where this issue should be debated is in the committee, in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That is a bipartisan body. Why not debate it there? Why are we having resolutions drafted in the Democratic Caucus and then suggesting that somehow, though, it was done in a nonpartisan way; that it was strictly bipartisan.

It is ridiculous to suggest that there were not partisan overtones and politically partisan motives behind drafting such a resolution in that caucus. I think that is the basis of the argument here. It is a question that has to be raised. Why is it that that caucus document was then sent directly to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? It was done with instructions from the Democratic Caucus. It seems to me that that is the kind of action that we are disagreeing with.

We have the perfect right, it seems to me, to disagree with actions of this Congress and of the Democratic Caucus within this Congress that we think ill-serve the entire foreign policy objectives.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, of course, the gentleman has the right to disagree with actions of the Democratic Caucus, but he should state correctly what happened.

There was not instruction by the Democratic Caucus to the Foreign Affairs Committee at its meeting last week. The gentleman is saying so, but he does not know the facts.

Further, if the gentleman suggests that this document, the one that was debated in the Democratic Caucus, was discussed with partisan overtones, perhaps he would not object if I asked unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman in the well a draft of the document be printed in the RECORD in its entirety.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, has this been cleared with the minority?

Mr. FOLEY. Well, the gentleman represents the minority.

Mr. WALKER. Well, the gentleman is not a part of the minority leadership, and under the Speaker's unanimous-consent obligation here, I thought we were supposed to clear it with the minority leadership before we proceed.

Mr. FOLEY. The Speaker was talking about bringing up legislation, not introducing things in the RECORD. What we were talking about in the joint leadership agreement was that legislation called to the floor for immediate consideration had to be cleared by both leaderships.

I am simply asking to include the text of the draft debated in the Democratic Caucus in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) so that people can judge for themselves whether it has partisan overtones or not.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I do not have any problem with that unanimous-consent request.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, I do not have any objection either.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if not, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the special order now under consideration, the text of the document entitled "Draft—February 1, 1984," which was considered in the Democratic Caucus, be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I would like to make just one other point.

We did find an issue the other day where the Democratic Party's language is somewhat questionable, where the majority leader the other day referred to the policies of the President as being "cruelly deranged."

It seems to me that that somehow fits a category that is somehow of even a lower class than using the word, "vicious," to describe the manner in which things are done.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman in the well yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, if I may regain my time, I am sorry that this has turned into a partisan jab contest. My points were three to make on the floor of the House: First, the fairness issue.

In my opinion, the timetable and the wording of the resolution were partisan and inappropriate for the Foreign Affairs Committee. Now, that is not such a vicious attack on the gentleman's party, simply a comment of my opinion.

No. 2, I believe that the substance of the resolution is misguided, and some of the information in it needed to be clarified and commented on. In 3 minutes I cannot finish doing that, but I shall for the record.

My third point—and I hope to have equal time on all three of these points—was to talk about the serious overtones of this resolution in terms of foreign policy in Lebanon and the implications for the future sovereignty of that country.

Those are the three points I wanted to make on the floor, and as all of us have heard, the three points deteriorated into one focal point, that being the partisanship of this resolution.

I have 2 minutes, and I will end by reinstating, if I may, several of the quotes of the resolution, and for the majority whip, in my comments the entire resolution is typed, so we will have it reiterated, along with his as well. "* * * Despite the lack of a realistic U.S. policy and the confusion about their mission * * *." That is a quote from the resolution.

Going on, it says that—

The refusal of the parties to the conflict to make the compromises necessary to promote progress toward a peaceful resolution of the country's problems, requires a United States policy which gives higher priority to diplomatic and political solutions.

It goes on to say in another part of the resolutions:

The administration's policy regarding Lebanon is not working.

It goes on in another section to say: "The administration has failed * * *." It goes on to say that the administration has failed several more times in the resolution.

For example, on page 4, lines 13 through 17, it says: "The failure of the administration's policy * * *" once again.

My only point is that this is an obvious attack in a political election year, with the polls so strongly supporting withdrawal of the marines, which we all support, and that this document has strong political overtones. I am glad to see that Members on both sides of the aisle are working to tone down the jargon of the document to make sure that the overtones are not heard but, rather, that the substantive points are made clear rather than engaging in a jabbing match on the political overtones in this document.

POINT-BY-POINT ANALYSIS OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY'S RESOLUTION ON LEBANON

(By Representative Mark D. Siljander, Member of the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East)

On October 27, 1983 the Washington Post reported that Speaker Thomas O'Neill, in a rebuke of Liberal Democrats shouted that the Democratic Party should put "patriotism above partisanship" and back President Reagan. The Post goes on to say that Speaker O'Neill took the occasion to shout his contempt for Democrats who "try to make this a partisan issue." He is in agreement with Reagan, O'Neill said, "because I am a PATRIOT!" (capitalization by the Washington Post).

And then President Reagan declared he was running for re-election.

Washington is a political town where people get paid to make genuine differences of opinion into political cannon fodder. They make a game out of "Gender-gaps" and "fairness issues" which we all have grown to expect. The Democratic resolution on the Marines withdrawal from Lebanon, approved by the Democratic caucus on February 2, goes beyond political games. The Democrats resolution on Lebanon resembles a Democratic National Committee "white paper" more than a foreign policy document. This resolution which will be read by our enemies and friends around the world, is in fact so seriously flawed as to endanger our relationships with valuable Middle East allies, invite terrorist attacks against all American citizens, jeopardize our Marines safety further by making them appear to be a force in retreat, and be potentially responsible for the deaths of thousands of Lebanese men, women and children. It is shocking that men who have built their careers and reputations on duty and non-partisan service to their country should so shame all Americans with this resolution.

"That (a) the Congress finds as follows: (1) Lebanon is important to United States interests in the Middle East, and the goal of the United States policy with respect to Lebanon remains the territorial integrity and independence of Lebanon."

The statement, although one we can certainly agree with, marks a clear a distinct retreat from the language used by this Committee in the War Powers Resolution passed last year. At that time we stated that the "removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East." Either it is no longer essential, or the Democrats choose to ignore the essential ingredients to peace in Lebanon.

"(2) There is however, widespread confusion among the American people about the mission of the United States Marines in Lebanon, and the President has been unable to present a convincing rationale for continued participation by the United States Armed Forces in the MNF in Lebanon under present circumstances."

The Democratic Party tends to underestimate the intelligence of the American citizen. In fact, the American public all too often understands Soviet complicity, this time in Syria, as a factor against freedom and peace more often than the leaders of the Democrats. President Reagan, Secretary Shultz and Secretary Weinberger have often told this Congress what the objective of United States policy in Lebanon is. It bears repeating."

"Our objectives in Lebanon have, from the beginning, been essentially threefold: The withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon; a sovereign, independent Lebaon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory; and security for Israel's northern border, so that the inhabitants of northern Israel can live in safety and without fear of artillery or rocket attacks."—Secretary of State George Shultz, September 21, 1983.

(The objectives are) "(1) a cessation of Syrian/PLO/Israeli hostilities; (2) a secure northern border for Israel; (3) the reestablishment of a strong central government of Lebanon which could secure sovereign control of Lebanese territory; and (4) the departure of all foreign forces from Lebanon."—Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinbeger, Sept. 23, 1983.

"Our goal in Lebanon is a political settlement between the government and the various confessional groups, aiming at a broader based government that can extend its sovereign authority throughout the country. In these circumstances we envisage the withdrawal of all foreign forces, as well as security arrangements to assure the security of Israel's northern border."—Secretary of State Shultz before House Foreign Affairs Committee on October 24, 1983.

Again and again the Administration has defined these objectives, which one hopes all Members of Congress share.

"(3) As the situation in Lebanon has deteriorated in recent months, it has posed increased dangers to the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon and has prohibited them for performing the peacekeeping mission which was the original justification for their presence in Lebanon."

The Democrats fail to point out how the situation has deteriorated in recent months. Clearly the bombing of the Marine compound in October was a tragedy. Our Marines, however, are in fortified positions that insure their safety against massive casualties, protect them against attack, and enable them to perform their duties.

It is important to understand just what their duties as peacekeepers entail. President Gemayel of Lebanon, who asked the MNF to come to Lebanon said on January 31, 1984:

"The presence of the Marines here is symbolic and provides moral support for the whole Free World. The Marines are not being asked to be militarily responsible."

The Marines, have done their job with an excellence that lives up to their reputation. Without their presence, the Government of Lebanon would have fallen, and all hopes for a free and democratic Lebanon would have vanished.

"(4) As the Department of Defense Commission on the Beirut International Airport Terrorist Act of 23 October (commonly known as the Long Commission) concluded, United States policy with respect to Lebanon has emphasized military options and the expansion of the United States military role and there is an urgent need for a reassessment of alternative means to acheive United States objectives in Lebanon in light of the changed circumstances."

The Administration and Members of Congress have continually searched for alternative means of achieving U.S. objectives. Rep. Siljander has proposed a phased withdrawal of Marines to naval ships anchored off the Lebanese coastline. Lebanese brigades, trained by the U.S. military would replace the Marines. This action would not only increase the safety for Marines but it would also allow for a continued U.S. presence in Lebanon. The key to Congressman Siljander's proposal and others like it, is that they are seeking ways to protect the Marines without sacrificing American interests and objectives and the lives of thousands of Lebanese civilians. This document, while not representative of all Democrats, makes no such attempt.

The document also contradicts itself between points 3 and 4. In the previous paragraph the resolution states that the "increased dangers to the U.S. Armed Forces . . . has prohibited them from performing their peacekeeping duties." Point 4 states that they are becoming too militaristic. The Democratic Party's argument becomes two-sided and begins to lack credibility.

In September, after receiving casualties, the President gave the Marines broad authority to use air strikes and artillery fire to protect U.S. troops and embassy personnel. It is vital that the Americans have the power to fire on those shooting at them and to retaliate after an attack. If this is what the Democrats describe as an increased military role, then they obviously lack understanding of the need to support our Marines.

"(5) The Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives, in its report dated December 19, 1983, concluded that, 'Sustained deployment of personnel in the situation of almost certain further casualties should only be undertaken if the policy objectives are visible, profoundly important and clearly obtainable. Failure of the Administration to adequately reexamine its policy and relate it to present conditions will only mean that such reexamination will have to be done by Congress."

The Document states that there will be further casualties in Lebanon. As a result we should pull out, unless the objectives are clear. Since the objectives are clear, the test of the statement has been passed. The real thrust of it, however, causes concern. If this Congress passes a resolution that makes continued U.S. presence contingent on there being no further casualties, it is extending an invitation to terrorists, snipers and other extremists to take every possible chance to kill American soldiers. If we let the terrorists know that all they have to do to win is kill Americans then they will try to oblige the Democrats.

The policies of the United States can never be contingent on the results of terriorists. Once we let them manipulate our foreign policy the safety of every American abroad, and many here in the United States will be in constant danger.

"(6) The United States Marines in Lebanon have performed superbly despite the lack of a realistic United States policy and the confusion about their mission, and every effort must be made to ensure that pending their withdrawal from Lebanon, measures are taken to protect their security which are commensurate with the risks of further terrorist attacks."

The Democrats do not know which way to take their arguments. They go from saying the Marines cannot perform their duties because they are not safe, to saying they are expanding their military role too much. Now they attempt to patronize patriotic Americans as a introduction to a blatantly political statement.

The United States policy in Lebanon, as examined earlier, is a clearly defined, realistic one. Due to the presence of the Marines the embattled Lebanese factions have held their first talks since 1976, and worked out all the essential ingredients of national reconciliation. The U.S. Army has successfully trained thousands of new Lebanese soldiers, and provided the stability in Beirut for the Army to begin the securing of its country.

As for the statement on troop safety, the Democrats know that extensive efforts have been made to improve it.

"(7) The situation in Lebanon, which is mired in internal domestic stalemate because of internal fighting and the refusal of the parties to the conflict to make compromises necessary to promote progress toward a peaceful resolution of the country's problems, requires a United States policy which gives higher priority to diplomatic and political solutions."

Most parties in Lebanon have worked to establish a lasting peace. If an agreement is put together, usually only one group, and that a Syrian puppet, vetos it. That means Christians, Sunnis, and most Shiites are agreeing on security agreements and national reconciliation. An example of this cooperation is seen in the make-up of the Lebanese Armed Forces. The officer corps is 50% Christian and Moslem. The enlisted men are 60% Moslem. The attempt to promote a multi-confessional military is a dramatic symbol of the way the opposing factions are moving together.

Only an ostrich would not see the intensive diplomatic negotiations going on in the Middle East. The United States has pursued every available channel to peace. Donald Rumsfeld has been shuttling between Syria, Washington and Beirut. The Administration even cooperated with the good-will mission by Rev. Jesse Jackson in order to secure the release of Lt. Goodman. President Reagan has gone so far as to offer to meet with Syrian President Assad. These negotiations have borne fruit. Progress is being made due to the high priority placed on diplomatic and political solutions on the U.S. part, Saudi Arabia, France and others.

The Democrats fail to comprehend the nature of our diplomatic strategy and the strategy applied by nations since the earliest recorded history. Our military is not there to win a war, but to support our diplomatic efforts. If the U.S. is to deal effectively in the Middle East and influence the perceptions of U.S. adversaries and their willingness to agree to political accommodation, the U.S. must be ready to apply measured force to protect important interests and objectives. This does not mean "war" in the traditional sense; rather, it is the use of military power to complement diplomacy. Presence may suffice to help achieve a diplomatic objective. But presence can be reinforced by the use of force (as with the U.S.S. New Jersey), thus creating rapid and effective self-defense.

"(8) The situation in Lebanon is drifting out of control and the administration's policy regarding Lebanon is not working. The United States is reacting to events rather than implementing policies which are in the national interest of the United States."

Once again, the Democratic Party's Resolution fails to grasp reality in Lebanon. Real progress has been made and is continuing. Without repeating too much of what has already been said, the public talks at Geneva and the private talks that have ensued have brought Lebanon closer to a democratic and unified nation. The problems of Lebanon are primarily external, not internal.

"The administration has failed to impress upon the Government of Lebanon the urgent need for it to develop a viable reconciliation plan, which might include such objectives as more equitable power sharing, early parliamentary elections, a new census, and the formation of a government of national reconciliation."

As mentioned before, the United States has facilitated negotiations between Lebanese factions for the purpose of reconciliation. It is Syrian interference that has prevented a settlement.

Page 4, Lines 8-12:

"(10) The administration has allowed the situation to dominate the United States agenda in the Middle East to the detriment of efforts for progress in the broader, and ultimately more important, Middle East peace process."

Peace in the Middle East can only take place when each nation feels secure about its own borders and protection. Lebanon is a flash point for potential war between Israel and Syria. Of all Israelis 75% believe a war with Syria in the near future is inevitable. Syrians are concerned about Israeli presence in Lebanon. Lebanon, a moderate Arab state is of course, embroiled in its own war. While this conflict remains unresolved, there can be no comprehensive Middle East peace.

The peace process can be served best by the continued efforts of the Reagan administration to restore Lebanon's sovereignty. If the Marines prematurely withdraw and the Government of Lebanon is overthrown because of its moderate policies and willingness to negotiate, it will have ominous implications for the peace process and other U.S. friends. If Syria successfully defeats the moderates, what will stop it from attempting to use its Soviet supplied muscle to destabilize and overthrow King Hussein of Jordan should he try to negotiate with Israel.

The United States is the guarantor of peace in the Middle East, since it has the power to protect the Persian Gulf from Soviet aggression. The U.S. also is the common denominator between the moderate Arabs (and some radical ones) and Israel. The entire Arab world will assess just how much they should trust the United States to protect them based on its actions in Lebanon. Contrary to the Democratic Party's resolution, success of U.S. efforts in Lebanon is the key to meaningful Arab-Israeli negotiations.

"The failure of the administration's policy has led to widespread concern among the American people that continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is not in the national interest."

The Democratic Party is attempting to make this statement a self-fulfilling prophecy. By using partisan politics to interfere with our foreign policy, the American people receive conflicting information. When we discuss Lebanon in terms of 18 factions it is confusing to an expert. But when the real issue is examined, it is clear. The situation is Lebanon vs. Syria. It is the forces of an independent Lebanon backed by the United States, France, Italy and Great Britain against the forces of a radical Arab state dominated by Syria and their ally, the Soviet Union.

Due to the partisan attacks on the President's policies, the American people are concerned with our prospects for success. With distortions and half-truths being told to them, as they exist in this Democratic Party resolution, it is no wonder they are concerned.

There can be no doubt that the late Honorable Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee understood what the results of this attempt at a political gain at the expense of our national interest. Three months before he died, Chairman Zablocki said:

"It is extremely important to make this as non-political and as bi-partisan of an effort as we can. It is in the national interest to avoid partisanship in this issue. The 18-month authorization will allow this President or the next President an opportunity to undertake his own review about what policy we are to follow in Lebanon, without time pressure."

Zablocki went on to say that the 18-month authorization would be long enough to (1) serve notice on the Syrians, their Soviet friends, and other parties in the Near East that the United States is serious about its assignment of Marines to the Multinational Force in Beirut, and (2) will depoliticize the issue by carrying the authorization date for their deployment past the November 1984 U.S. election date.

Mr. Zablocki was a statesman. In matters of United States security and freedom around the world he rose above partisan politics. His efforts to take the Lebanese issue out of the Presidential political arena are being thwarted by his own party members. Perhaps they would do well to earn from his example

"(b) Therefore, the Congress declares that United States policy toward Lebanon should include the following elements:

"(1) The prompt and orderly withdrawal of the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, in consultation with other members of the Multinational Force."

It is in this section that the Democrats remove all doubt that this is merely a political manifesto and not a responsible foreign policy document.

First, the Democratic Party's resolution uses a deliberately nebulous word as the key word in the document. Does prompt mean 30 days or 90 days? The word puts the Democrats in the position of criticizing the President without making any recommendations to back up their case. Since the premature withdrawal of Americans would be disasterous, the Democrats seek to avoid responsibility by obscuring their intent.

Second, the phrase does not call for a withdrawal in such a way as to preserve the objectives and national interests of the United States. It calls for a unilateral and unconditional pullout. Most experts believe that such a pullout would bring about a rapid collapse of the Gemayel government and the installation of a Syrian/Soviet manipulated regime. President Gemayel summed it up best:

"(Referring to advocates of a pullout) are they thinking about the alternative to the collapse of the Lebanese system and government and what this will mean to the Free World in general and the American interests in the Middle East? Who will be the main beneficiary of such a collapse? If these critics think hard on these questions, maybe they will see that the interests of Lebanon are important to the interests of the Free World."

In the same Washington Post interview President Gemayel warned the U.S. Congress that a withdrawal of the Marines from Lebanon now would mean the end of Lebanese unity and democracy and, beyond that, would endanger Western interests in the Middle East.

Third, the collapse of the Lebanese government which would almost certainly follow the surrender/pullout envisioned by the Democratic Party's resolution would create a vacuum in Lebanon that would spark fighting far worse than has yet been seen in Lebanon. It is probable that thousands of Lebanese men, women and children would die, and tens of thousands wounded and homeless not to mention actual military losses.

Fourth, the collapse of the government and the instability that would occur would dangerously increase the chances for direct Syrian and Israeli fighting. The next war between these two will be much worse than before. The Soviets have at 7,000 combat "advisors" in Syria, actually operating the SA-5 anti-aircraft rockets. It is clear that Soviets would be shooting down Israelis and that Soviets would die as a result of Israeli air strikes against the sites. The Soviets have also provided the Syrians with land based missiles can hit almost all areas of Israel, creating the prospect for significant loss of civilian life and the specter of United States involvement. The likely scenario suggests that a Soviet-American confrontation in the Middle East is highly likely. A new Arab oil embargo against the United States would also be probable, hurting our economy and exacerbating an already precarious economic situtation in our country.

Fifth, in the event that war could be avoided between Syria and Israel, almost all moderate Arab countries would be forced to reassess their relationships with the United States. Jordan would clearly retreat from the peace process and Egypt would most likely continue its slow drift away from normal relations with Israel.

Page 4 and 5, line 24-25 and 1-9:

"(2) A concerted diplomatic effort at the United Nations to replace the MNF in Lebanon with another international peacekeeping force under United Nations auspices, as called for in section 5(c) of the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution, such effort to include discussions with the Secretary General of the United Nations, the President of the Security Council, and all members of the Security Council. If this is not successful, the United States must intensify efforts to obtain agreement by other countries to assume peacekeeping responsibilities in the Beirut area."

This provision is misleading as to the intent of Section 5(c) of the War Powers Resolution. The section was a "sense of the Congress" that the U.S. should discuss the establishment of a U.N. peacekeeping force with other members of the Security Council. It also called for an analysis of the response from those talks to see what the implications were. It also called for these talks "not later" than September of 1984.

Asking the Security Council to bail us out of Lebanon is a foolish idea. If the U.S. goes before the Council and asks for a U.N. peacekeeping force, it faces the likely prospect of a Soviet veto and risks further international embarrassment. If the Soviets would approve such a resolution, the price the United States would have to pay would be too high. The Soviets would most likely demand an increased presence in the Middle East, a move that would be highly detrimental to U.S. interests. Such an abrogation of our position in the Middle East would clearly send the wrong signals to moderate Arab states.

"(3) Advising the Government of Lebanon of the urgent need for that Government to develop a reconciliation plan which recognizes the legitimate aspirations of all confessional groups."

The existing efforts to this effect have been previously discussed. It does make one wonder where the Democrats have been the last few months.

"(4) Development of intensified diplomatic efforts with Syria, as soon as possible, to achieve acceptance by Syria, and the factions it supports in Lebanon, of a reconciliation plan."

This seemingly simple phrase shows why it is dangerous to trust the Nation's foreign affairs to the Democratic National Committee. The Democratic Party's resolution shows a profound misunderstanding of the Syrian role in Lebanon. Syria believes that Lebanon is part of a "Greater Syria" and has no real interest in a peaceful reconciliation agreement. This is particularly true if the United States is in a mode of retreat. Again and again we have seen that the Syrians respond best to strength, and exploit weakness. The Syrians want nothing more than a withdrawal of the MNF so that he can attempt to fulfill his goals.

This naivite, if enacted into law, would only bring about increased tragedy for Lebanon at the hands of Assad, a ruthless dictator with his own people, much less others.

"Promotion of a continuing dialogue between the Governments of Israel and Lebanon concerning security arrangements and a reconciliation plan for Lebanon."

One of the key accomplishments of the Reagan administration has been the May 17th Agreement calling for full Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon and normalization of relations. This agreement, however, is one of the main reasons for Syrian intransigence. Syria does not want a second Arab state to recognize Israel, nor do they feel an Israeli withdrawal should be timed to coincide with a Syrian withdrawal. Lebanese-Israeli dialogue is continuing and has had tangible results. It is with the Syrians that the Lebanese need a dialogue.

"(6) Continuation of other efforts to achieve the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and the reestablishment of a sovereign independent Lebanon, taking into account the legitimate security concerns of Syria and Israel."

If this resolution were to bear the force of law, there would be no foreign troop withdrawal. Even its passage would be a signal that Syrian intransigence was achieving its intended results.

It is clear that Syria, while perhaps not being directly involved, has been at least tacitly involved in the terrorist attacks against the Multinational Force and Israel, including the attack that killed 240 Marines. Syria has used whatever means at its disposal to drive the MNF out, and increase its hold on Lebanon. All indications are that Assad does not want to leave Lebanon and will only do so if pressure for a settlement is great enough. The Democratic Party's resolution awards Syria for its role in killing U.S. Marines and destabilizing Lebanon. For that reason alone the resolution should be defeated.

"(7) Renewal of efforts to pursue vigorously a broader Middle East peace to reduce tensions through the region as a step in facilitating peace and reconciliation in Lebanon."

This issue has been discussed earlier, but suffice it to say that the presence of this provision in a resolution calling for the unilateral surrender/pullout of the Marines shows an inability to grasp the Arab mindset. The Arab states, even the moderate ones will not negotiate with Israel until all of their troops are out of Lebanon. Egypt has not had an ambassador present in Israel since June of 1982, and has vowed not to send one back until the Israelis withdraw entirely from Lebanon.

In short, there can be no comprehensive Middle East settlement without solving Lebanon's problems first.

Page 6, lines 5-12:

"(8) Intensification of United States efforts to retrain and reequip the Lebanese Armed Forces, including efforts to increase military assistance and the delivery of defense articles and defense services to enable the Government of Lebanon to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon and enable local security forces to assume internal security functions among the various communities in the country."

Once again, this provision, on its own a good one, is in direct conflict with the main goal of the Democratic Party's resolution, which is unilateral surrender/withdrawal in an orderly fashion. This provision is helpful if it leads to phased, responsible withdrawal. The United States, contrary to the tone of the provision has been actively training new Lebanese Armed Forces.

Since the military aid program began in October 1982, the Lebanese Armed Forces has increased in size from 17,500 to over 32,000 today. Two new brigades, currently being trained will be armed and equipped within 90 days, and two more brigades are expected within the year. The program will bring the strength of the Lebanese forces up to 60,000.

One important point that this provision raises is that the Lebanese government is having difficulty receiving the defense items it needs. The Gemayel administration has been asking for 10 out-dated Hawker-Hunter fighters to double the size of the Lebanese air force. The United States should move more forcefully to give the Lebanese forces what they need to reclaim their national sovereignty.

"(9) Implementation of an economic assistance program for Lebanon with funds already appropriated, and with the immediate assistance of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to start sound economic reconstruction and development projects and energize the Lebanese government to provide better services and more presence in as much of the country as possible."

The Reagan administration has provided substantial aid to Lebanon in the regular Foreign Assistance budget and the Supplemental. Lebanon has access to massive amounts of dollars from Saudi Arabia, and actually pays for 80% of their defense purchases with cash.

Once again, the intent of the resolution, while positive as a separate provision is contradictory to the surrender/withdrawal provision. Since the Gemayel government would fall, hostilities would increase to new levels of intensity, and foreign troops would retrench, any attempt to build-up the infrastructure of Lebanon is merely handing cash to the Syrians who will take over in Lebanon.

This provision also fails to account for the tremendous entrepreneural spirit of the Lebanese people. Their country has always been the door to the Middle East, and shows signs of revitalization every time there is a period of peace. A Lebanon free from foreign occupation will be able to restore itself economically. A Lebanon left to the Syrian army cannot hope to be revived.

"(10) Implementation of a series of plans, including military contingency plans, to protect against the increasing threat which terrorism poses to the United States and its friends and interests in the region. Such plans should include improvement of United States intelligence gathering, coordination, and assessment capabilities in Lebanon in order to protect United States interests, citizens, and Armed Forces in Lebanon and to guard against terrorist attacks."

President Reagan has been developing plans and legislation to help combat terrorism. Our improved strategic relationship with Israel gives the United States increased access to Middle East intelligence. The improvement in intelligence was demonstrated by the discovery of planned suicide-airplane attacks against American ship, which led to threats of American preemptive strikes and increased preparedness.

The provision once again avoids the problem the resolution creates. The surrender/withdrawal on a unilateral basis serves as a reward to terrorism. By showing cowardice in this Congress in the face of radical Moslem terrorist attacks we are extending the greatest written invitation to terrorism.

"(c) Not later than 30 days after the adoption of this resolution, the President shall submit a written report to the Congress on the actions he has taken to implement these policies."

It is worth reading this section just to see something specific and tangible mentioned. The political overtones of the Resolution are concluded, by attempting to shift all responsibility for the irresponsible actions contemplated by this document onto the President.

CONCLUSION

The Democratic Party's resolution is one of the most blatant political efforts ever made in the Foreign Affairs Committee. It represents, at best, a partisan infringement on a sensitive area of U.S. interests and, at worst, a cruel hoax that could potentially be responsible for the loss of thousands of lives, the loss of American prestige, a major Middle East war, and the collapse of freedom and democracy in Lebanon. This is an irresponsible effort to play politics where it is most inappropriate to do so.

In the Foreign Affairs full committee meeting on February 1, Democratic Representative Stephen Solarz said, "This document has clear partisan overtones. This is far too important to take up hastily in an ill conceived manner." Apparently many Democrats who have been devoted friends of Israel and authors of bipartisan consensus on the Middle East in general see the danger in this resolution.

An effectively coordinated, calibrated and coherent policy can only be carried out by a Presidential decision and adherence to it within the Executive Branch. The Congress must realize that it can thwart a coherent policy but it is incapable of formulating or implementing a coherent policy of its own. Congress helps determine basic policy, but the Administration risks serious undermining of basic U.S. interests if Congress attempts to micro-manage U.S. policy or act to undercut it. It is clear that foreign nations, adversaries in particular, are acutely conscious of trends in Congressional moods and pressures on the Administration.

There is no room for partisan politics where thousands of American and Lebanese lives are at stake. Perhaps Speaker O'Neill said it best himself last year when he stated, "Politics stops at our shoreline, and we are no longer Democrats or Republicans but Americans." The Middle East and the United States would be a lot safer if the Speaker would follow his own admonition.

H. CON. RES. 248

Concurrent resolution to bring about the prompt and orderly withdrawal of the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That (a) the Congress finds as follows:

(1) Lebanon is important to United States interests in the Middle East, and the goal of United States policy with respect to Lebanon remains the territorial integrity and independence of Lebanon.

(2) There is, however, widespread confusion among the American people about the mission of the United States Marines in Lebanon, and the President has been unable to present a convincing rationale for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon under present circumstances.

(3) As the situation in Lebanon has deteriorated in recent months, it has posed increased dangers to the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon and has prohibited them from performing the peacekeeping mission which was the original justification for their presence in Lebanon.

(4) As the Department of Defense Commission on the Beirut International Airport Terrorist Act of 23 October 1983 (commonly known as the "Long Commission") concluded, United States policy with respect to Lebanon has emphasized military options and the expansion of the United States military role and there is an urgent need for a reassessment of alternative means to achieve United States objectives in Lebanon in light of the changed circumstances.

(5) The Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives, in its report dated December 19, 1983, concluded that, "Sustained deployment of personnel in the situation of almost certain further casualties should only be undertaken if the policy objectives are visible, profoundly important and clearly obtainable. Failure of the administration to adequately reexamine its policy and relate it to present conditions will only mean that such reexamination will have to be done by Congress".

(6) The United States Marines in Lebanon have performed superbly despite the lack of a realistic United States policy and the confusion about their mission, and every effort must be made to ensure that, pending their withdrawal from Lebanon, measures are taken to protect their security which are commensurate with the risks of further terrorist and other attacks.

(7) The situation in Lebanon, which is mired in internal domestic stalemate because of internal fighting and the refusal of the parties to the conflict to make the compromises necessary to promote progress toward a peaceful resolution of the country's problems, requires a United States policy which gives higher priority to diplomatic and political solutions.

(8) The situation in Lebanon is drifting out of control and the administration's policy regarding Lebanon is not working. The United States is reacting to events rather than implementing policies which are in the national interest of the United States.

(9) The administration has failed to impress upon the Government of Lebanon the urgent need for it to develop a viable reconcilation plan, which might include such objectives as more equitable power sharing, early parliamentary elections, a new census, and the formation of a government of national reconciliation.

(10) The administration has allowed the situation in Lebanon to dominate the United States agenda in the Middle East to the detriment of efforts for progress in the broader, and ultimately more important, Middle East peace process.

(11) The failure of the administration's policy has led to widespread concern among the American people that continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is not in the national interest.

(b) Therefore, the Congress declares that United States policy toward Lebanon should include the following elements:

(1) The prompt and orderly withdrawal of the United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, in consultation with other members of the Multinational Force.

(2) A concerted diplomatic effort at the United Nations to replace the Multinational Force in Lebanon with another international peacekeeping force under United Nations auspices, as called for in section 5(c) of the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution, such effort to include discussions with the Secretary General of the United Nations, the President of the Security Council, and all members of the Security Council. If this is not successful, the United States must intensify efforts to obtain agreement by other countries to assume peacekeeping responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(3) Advising the Government of Lebanon of the urgent need for that Government to develop a reconciliation plan which recognizes the legitimate aspirations of all confessional groups.

(4) Development of intensified diplomatic efforts with Syria, as soon as possible, to achieve acceptance by Syria, and the factions it supports in Lebanon, of a reconciliation plan for Lebanon.

(5) Promotion of a continuing dialogue between the Government of Israel and Lebanon concerning security arrangements and a reconciliation plan for Lebanon.

(6) Continuation of other efforts to achieve the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and the reestablishment of a sovereign independent Lebanon, taking into account the legitimate security concerns of Syria and Israel.

(7) Renewal of efforts to pursue vigorously a broader Middle East peace to reduce tensions through the region as a step in facilitating peace and reconciliation in Lebanon.

(8) Intensification of United States efforts to retrain and reequip the Lebanese Armed Forces, including efforts to increase military assistance and the delivery of defense articles and defense services to enable the Government of Lebanon to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon and enable local security forces to assume internal security functions among various communities in the country.

(9) Implementation of an economic assistance program for Lebanon with funds already appropriated, and with the immediate assistance of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to start sound economic reconstruction and development projects and energize the Lebanese Government to provide better services and more presence in as much of the country as possible.

(10) Implementation of a series of plans, including military contingency plans, to protect against the increasing threat which terrorism poses to the United States and its friends and interests in the region. Such plans should include improvement of United States intelligence gathering coordination, and assessment capabilities in Lebanon in order to protect United States interests, citizens, and Armed Forces in Lebanon and to guard against terrorist attacks.

(c) Not later than 30 days after the adoption of this resolution, the President shall submit a written report to the Congress on the actions he has taken to implement these policies.

THE EXCLUSIONARY RULE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. REID) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, during my 20 years of law practice in my home of Las Vegas, I came to view with growing concern a legal phenomenon known as the exclusionary rule.

Simply stated, the exclusionary rule prohibits the use in criminal proceedings of evidence that the court determines was obtained in violation of constitutional guidelines; in other words, the criminal goes free because the constable goofed. My legal experience has shown that the major problem with the exclusionary rule is presented when the law enforcement officer believed he was acting within the confines of the law, but was later second-guessed by a judge.

The 1971 U.S. Supreme Court case of Collidge against New Hampshire illustrates the extent of the problem. A 14-year-old girl was found with her throat slit and a bullet in her head 8 days after she had disappeared. Police contacted the wife of a suspect whose car was like one seen near the crime, and she gave them her husband's guns. Tests proved that one of the weapons had fired the fatal bullet.

Invoking his statutory authority, the attorney general of the State issued a warrant for the arrest of the suspect and the seizure of his car. He was captured and convicted. But the Supreme Court reversed the conviction on the grounds that the warrant was defective, the search of the auto unreasonable and vacuum sweepings from the auto—which matched the victim's clothing—were inadmissible. The Court in so holding stated that the attorney general who issued the warrant had personally assumed direction of the investigation and thus was not a "neutral and detached magistrate."

Lawmaking, by any definition, involves the serious, insightful thinking of those people with the authority to create—and sometimes enforce—their enactments.

When considering this creative process at a Federal level, laws can be created in 2 ways—by the U.S. Congress through legislation, in the form of public laws; or by the U.S. Supreme Court through its decisions, in the form of case law.

From whichever seedling the process derives one point is clear: The laws of a nation, are the mandates of social behavior and form the most instructive portion of a nation's history.

I would like to focus on one particular element of our legal history—one that involves basic protections delineated in the Bill of Rights and the evolutionary interpretations applied to those rights. More specifically I want to discuss the exclusionary rule, its application and need for revision.

To some this rule is considered the embodiment of our Nation's commitment to insuring that the fourth amendment's restraints on the power of government are zealously observed.

To others this rule has replaced the fourth amendment itself as the source of the prohibition against illegal behavior, in this application the unreasonable search or seizure by law enforcement officials.

Let us take a closer look at this provision which permits the exclusion from trial of evidence seized in an illegal search.

It is important to understand that this rule has been the product of case law—not legislative enactments.

The judicial direction has occurred because, although the fourth amendment secures the right of persons to be free of unreasonable searches or seizures, the amendment has no constitutional nor statutory provisions defining or limiting the meaning of "unreasonable." Therefore, case by case, since Mapp against Ohio in 1961 the Judiciary has designed the use and application of the rule.

This Supreme Court decision, in reality, was the last event of a three-stage process.

The first stage was the formulation and adoption of the fourth amendment. Next the annexation of the exclusionary rule to the fourth amendment. And, finally, the incorporation of the fourth amendment and the exclusionary rule into the 14th amendment, which restricts the separate states.

Let me briefly address these stages of evolution.

The fourth amendment was designed to protect the citizens of this country from the unrestricted searches or seizures they had experienced in England. Historically, English monarchs granted this power in two forms. The first, a general warrant, did not require the name of the alleged violator and was valid for the duration of the life of the monarch under whose name it was issued. The second, a writ of assistance, permitted its bearer, usually a customs official, to search with unlimited discretion for the duration of the life of the reigning monarch.

Since the fourth amendment itself contains no provision for the exclusion of illegally obtained evidence, the Supreme Court rendered decisions to create this exception.

This, the second stage of the rule's development, dealt with various considerations:

First, the impact of the fourth amendment violations on fifth amendment rights regarding self-incrimination; second, the crucial timing for requesting suppression and/or return of the illegally obtained evidence; third, the use of reproduced evidence after the return of the actually seized materials and the treatment of contraband; and fourth, the defendant's right to suppress.

These are just some of the considerations that led to the third stage of the rule's evolution—the incorporation of the fourth amendment into the liberties protected by the due process clause of the 14th amendment. This would apply and enforce the exclusionary rule at the State level.

By this time we had entered the sixties—giving judicial background to the Mapp against Ohio decision.

Although common law, via the Mapp decision, indicates that the exclusionary rule is constitutionally required, experts are still unclear as to the source of the requirement.

Some say the exclusion is mandated by the Constitution by way of the fourth or fifth amendment, or both. Another theory rests on the premise that the exclusionary rule is constitutionally required in order to prevent the Government from securing the aid of the judiciary in giving effect to a fourth amendment violation or to prevent the judiciary itself from committing what is described as a second fourth amendment violation—by hearing tainted evidence.

A third theory maintains that the exclusionary rule is a constitutionally required remedy.

The theory continues that in order to give effect to the Constitution's prohibition against illegal searches and seizures, it may be necessary for the judiciary to remove the incentive for violating it. This interpretation treats the exclusion of unconstitutionally obtained evidence not as a contitutional right but as a constitutional remedy—a product of the judiciary.

In realizing the necessity to protect the provisions of the fourth amendment we must remember that the only constitutional requirement is for some effective remedy to ensure that Government agents obey the fourth amendment.

Let us look at the practicality of alternative remedies—ones that we might consider to replace exclusion.

One possibility is an existing Federal statute that makes it a crime for anyone—acting under color of law—to deprive a person of rights protected by the Constitution. The Supreme Court has modified this further to apply only to cases involving willful deprivation of constitutional rights. In its present form—critics say—the harshness of the sanction might be an obstacle to its effective enforcement.

Another suggested remedy is an action in Federal court seeking an injunction against fourth amendment violations. The problem with this remedy is that unless a victim of unconstitutional police practices can prove the likelihood of future injuries, the injunction would not be used.

A commonly used remedy is legal action for damages against Federal officials directly under the fourth amendment. This remedy does have some advantages over the exclusionary rule.

For one, it compensates the victims of fourth amendment violations as well as those victims accused of criminal offenses. Second, it has an element of proportionality because the amount of the judgment may be varied to reflect the degree of the constitutional violation. Third, the imposition of a direct sanction on the violator produces some measure of specific deterrence.

Damage actions, however, are not a panacea. Often, juries believe the police were just "doing their jobs" and do not find for the victim. In other instances lawyers are hesitant to take these cases because of the unlikelihood of a win. However, even when there is a positive holding for the victim, often the police officer does not have the funds to satisfy the judgment.

When reviewing all of these alternatives one important consideration stands out: We cannot forget that, in addition to protecting a person from fourth amendment violations, we must use the remedy to deter further illegal activities. That is why, in the sixties, the Court took a position not to apply the rule retroactively.

In order to preserve the purpose of the exclusionary rule, the Court developed a balancing approach in the seventies. This means weighing the potential injury to the proper functioning of the proceeding against the incremental deterrent effect that might be achieved by extending the rule to that proceeding.

During the eighties, the Court reconsidered the use of the rule and in a 1982 decision, allowed the retroactive application of the rule as a deterrent effect.

Like anything else of major import, the exclusionary rule is not without its alleged weaknesses.

The most common complaint is what preserving the fourth amendment's guarantees costs society in terms of otherwise reliable evidence.

Others argue that the rule actually does not have a deterrent effect because police often are not motivated by constitutional restraints but, rather, by the seizure of evidence.

A third argument is that the rule benefits defendants in a manner often disproportionate to the degree to which their fourth amendment rights were violated.

And a final legitimate argument is that the rule compensates only those accused of crimes.

So, what do we do now?

We could reduce the impact of the rule by making it easier for conscientious police officers, to comply with the fourth amendment.

And we could limit the circumstances in which exclusion of illegally obtained evidence is required.

In making compliance easier, the courts could state clear rules governing recurring-fact situations where the rule would apply. This is easier than it sounds.

Or, we could relax the rule's strict requirements—judicially or constitutionally.

As far as limiting the circumstances for applying the rule some suggest substituting the use of the rule in Federal criminal proceedings with a right of action against the Federal Government. This would involve actions for actual and punitive damages and could include administrative sanctions.

But, again, we come back to the question of deterrence and how these approaches would affect officers' attitudes at the time of violation.

That brings us to the most-hotly debated modification to the rule—the good faith exception. Basically, this would not require the exclusion of evidence obtained in the reasonable belief that the search and seizure at issue were consistent with the fourth amendment.

Three strong arguments have been advanced for the good faith exception:

First, exclusion is required only where its deterrent effects outweigh its costs.

Second, when a police officer acts with a reasonable but mistaken belief that his conduct is consistent with the fourth amendment, there is no deterrent served by the exclusion.

Third, exclusion frequently results in the freeing of the guilty—a terrible social cost.

As lawmakers, it is time for us to realize that there is a need for change with regard to the exclusionary rule.

As lawmakers, we must recognize that we could and should have a role in determining the practice and application of the rule—one which has a major impact on our whole system of justice.

As lawmakers, let us consider the importance of a good faith exception and look to legislation that protects not only the treatment of evidence, but, most importantly, the intent of the rules that govern this Nation, and provide rights to all of its people.

FROM THE INVISIBLE HAND, A GESTURE OF CONTEMPT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I do believe in the invisible hand of the market, even as it pertains to steel; but having watched world commerce, I know that all hands have fingers, particularly as they have affected steel since we adjourned the first session.

Fingers may point in blame, beckon or show direction; they can be used to test the weather or they can be sticky. A finger to the lips asks silence in a conspiracy and one to the temple in a circular motion signals lunacy.

In our culture, the finger of a divinely inspired hand wrote the future on a palace wall, and it also engraved the Commandments brought down from the Mount. Fingers drawn inward make a fist of the hand, and this is a sign of the intent to strike.

Furthermore, there are lone hands, upper hands, heavy hands, and hands that wash one another, whether visible or invisible. There are right hands that do not know what left hands are doing. Things can go hand in glove, and often the hand is of iron and the glove of velvet.

Hands and fingers, and the understanding of their language, are a mainstay of human communication even today amid the marvels of electronics. They show direction.

THE DIRECTION OF WORLD STEEL

Since we adjourned the first session, event has piled rapidly on event in world steel and the sum of these developments points toward more—and more intense—raiding of the U.S. market.

Even an unskilled hand can retrace the route of the invisible hand once it has moved. You cannot tell where a tornado will form; you cannot miss where it has been; there is devastation where it has touched down. The question we should consider is whether it is due to the hand of man or to natural forces.

So let us start with December 27, 1982, when Bethlehem Steel closed about 20 percent of its capacity and fired 10,000 workers.

These were workers and plants that had been competitive but fell after an 18-month siege by massive amounts of dumped and subsidized steel. The dumping and subsidies were officially proved in unfair trade cases.

Nevertheless, the Europeans continued to subsidize their industry, and the heavy hand of government staved off the bankruptcies that the invisible hand might have directed. The Asians held the hand of government and leaned on policy. The developing nations added capacity and increased shipments in the snap of an invisible finger.

And this remained the only steel-producing nation in the world to maintain an open market; and it is still the world's biggest market.

Then on December 27, 1983, United States Steel announced the closing of about 20 percent of its capacity and the firing of about 15,000 workers.

Again the cause was loss of market to dumped and subsidized steel, this time over the last 30 months. And once again trade findings are proving the case.

And still there is maneuvering in Europe, support in Asia, and ambition in the developing world.

The Europeans are showing a uniqueness in their adjustment to world conditions—a unique hypocrisy.

For example, U.S. protectionism was condemned out of hand in December by the European Community's man in Washington, Sir Roy Denman. He said it threatens to topple orderly world trade. He scolded American steelmakers for claiming their legal right to fair trade, for fighting subsidy, and dumping.

And Sir Roy was particularly indignant over the Fair Trade in Steel Act and its 15-percent quota, which incidentally, would be the most generous in the world.

Meantime, in Europe, almost as Sir Roy sermonized here, the European Community began talks with a number of countries on a matter of great importance, according to the Wall Street Journal.

They began negotiations on steel.

They began negotiations on restraining steel imports from 15 nations, including Brazil, South Korea, and Japan. The Europeans want quotas that will limit their imports from the 15 nations to 4.4 million tons a year; this is less than 300,000 tons per year per nation.

Mr. Speaker, a 15-percent quota would have four times 4.4 million tons of imports into this market in a good year. We took almost four times 4.4 million tons in 1983, and it was a bad one. The finger would have to move a long way down our list of trading partners to get to one who sent only 300,000 tons.

What the European hand pushes away will have to find a resting place, and this is the only open market in the world; and at 15 percent, it would remain the most open.

Is this the infinite wisdom of the invisible hand? Or is it merely a finger of the hand raised in the universal gesture of contempt and disdain?

EUROPEAN HAND SUPPORTS PRICES

Among the things that caused Sir Roy to wring his hands was the corrupting effect that a successful exercise of the legal right to fair trade might have on American business. And he condemned the higher prices he saw falling on American consumers.

In Europe, the Community has just completed arrangements for internal production quotas and a price-fixing plan. They are setting "minimum prices" to end what they view as cutthroat competition to restore some profitability to the market.

As the director of the German Iron and Steel Federation said, "It would be much better to have clear control of subsidies, but the second best choice is to control the quantities of steel traded; and it seems the Community has got this point."

The Germans calculate subsidies of $75 to $85 a ton for steelmakers in Britain, France, Belgium, and Italy. They figure subsidies on coil products from Finsider—an Italian concern—at $137 a ton for items selling at $278. They complain of sharp price cutting meant to keep up output and employment.

Meantime, even our flinty-eyed American market analysts acknowledge that "cutthroat competition" from imports has destroyed profitability for U.S. companies. New records for losses are set each year.

Clearly the hand of the market wears a government-designed velvet glove in Europe.

A JOINING OF HANDS

In addition, there are telling combinations taking place within countries as well as between and among different countries. And the invisible finger signals that the goal is the only open market in the world.

In Sweden, almost as Sir Roy wagged his finger at us in the name of free trade, four big specialty steel firms announced they will merge to become one of the biggest in the world. They will be very efficient.

And one of the prime market strategies of the surviving steelmaker is penetration of the U.S. market through an American subsidiary, Ingersoll Steel.

The Wall Street Journal story on the merger said the Swedes look on Ingersoll as a "strategic beachhead." It is peculiar how often the language of war finds application in international trade.

Meantime, a major U.S. specialty company has had to lodge a complaint with our Government on what seems to be a haphazard and ineffective monitoring of specialty imports. Specialty steel is monitored because the American industry fought and won a major case while under assault from massive subsidy and dumping.

Furthermore, in Germany, Krupp and another giant company (Kloeckner) have merged casting and processing operations for titanium steel, forged pieces, and steel for railroads. They expect significant savings and higher productivity.

All of these firms compete directly with American workers and companies because this is again the only open market in the world.

The striking thing about these mergers is that in none of them does the hand of government seem to have been raised on antitrust or any other grounds. In most cases the governments officiated at the marriage ceremony.

They do not worry overseas about things like competitive balance in the market because the only market in which they really compete is this one; and they get every kind of help and encouragement to do it.

Invisible hands can shake in agreement and work toward a common goal when they have secured profitability and there is an open market.

HANDS ACROSS THE OCEANS

The combinations are not restricted by national boundaries.

For example, American specialty steel companies recently initiated a trade case against a Spanish steelmaker. The allegation is that there has been a violation of fairly won specialty quotas.

The owners of the Scofflaw Co. are a Spanish bank—talk about access to capital—and a Japanese company.

Also, in Europe, the Government of Belgium and Luxesbourg have worked out a deal to save three steel companies in which they have social and business interests, the Journal reports.

The company controlled by the Government of Belgium and the one controlled by the Government of Luxembourg will share their EC production quotas. The third one—the one they own jointly—will get a $250 million infusion of capital.

In addition, events in the developing world have kept pace with those in Europe. In Asia, the South Korean Government is building another export mill. The Government of Taiwan wants to expand its capacity.

And in Brazil, whose steel exports here were up 108 percent last year, the first heats have been run in a brand new $3 billion export mill. The first steel will arrive here this month.

This new plant is jointly owned by the Brazilian Government and two minority foreign partners.

The partners are Kawasaki of Japan and Finsider of Italy. Finsider is the firm willing to subsidize up to 50 percent of the price of a ton. It is 93 percent owned by the Government of Italy. It lost $2 billion in the last 2 years and the announced plan is to put $3 billion more into it by the end of 1985.

As for Brazilian steel, the U.S. Department of Commerce recently returned yet another verdict; the hand was found to be deeply in the cookie jar. There was a finding of dumping margins of up to 179 percent on hot rolled sheet and up to 225 percent on hot rolled plate.

It seems that one invisible hand washes another in international commerce.

Furthermore, the Dutch will put an additional $315 million into keeping alive their big steel group; and the French are hard at work trying to keep their biggest company out of the death grip of the invisible hand, which we know as bankruptcy.

ON THE OTHER HAND

Meanwhile, there have been two developments in the United States, the only open market in the world, that we can compare to see who might emerge with the upper hand.

United States Steel's closings drew applause from market analysts; from another part of the financial community, the act drew a reduction in credit rating. The reason? The company's debt-to-equity ratio now is too high. The result: Higher borrowing costs in hand-to-hand combat with competition that has low cost or no cost government financing. Debt accounts for more than 80 percent of capitalization in some steel industries.

And a merger between two big steel companies is pending in the United States. It has been pending since September. It has been delayed while the Justice Department tries to read the palm of our invisible hand to predict what might happen here if it is permitted.

And all we have heard from Justice in public comment in more than 120 days is a thinly veiled threat. The quota bill, a Justice spokesman said, might make the merger anticompetitive and, therefore, doomed.

Is the invisible finger pointed at our temple and moving in circles? Or is the swirling merely the winds coming together for another tornado?

Meantime, in the world, companies have merged within countries and countries have come together within companies. Feeding from the generous hand of government, they will compete with subsidies of 50 percent and dumping margins of 225 percent.

They speak of and they establish strategic beachheads in the only open market in the world. They use the language of war; and the first law of war is that there are no laws.

They do business in ways not sanctioned by what we consider to be sound practice; and they do things forbidden by law to American companies, particularly as they gather capital. In addition, they combine in power concentrations that would be severely punished were they to take place here; they fix prices and they agree on who will make what and where it will go.

Is this the invisible hand of the American market working its evolutionary magic? Or is it the gloved fist unclenching momentarily to render a mono-digital salute to some quaint and insular 19th century notions that blend the passion of theology with the novel findings of economics?

In short, is it creative destruction or simply destruction?

THE MOVING FINGER

As the poet, Fitzgerald, so appropriately said:

> The moving finger writes; and having writ, moves on; nor all your piety nor wit shall lure it back to cancel half a line, nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

It may be bad business to fix prices in the long run; I believe this, firmly.

It may be bad business for government to subsidize and to own in the long run; I believe this as well.

However, just as bad money drives out good, so does bad business make it impossible for good business to survive; neither can honest workmen pay their taxes nor meet their responsibilities nor make the contributions this society demands if they play the lone hand against foreign governments.

If you cannot survive the short run, there is no long run. The immediate future is being written today by the hands of foreign governments in languages we consistenly refuse to comprehend.

But, neither pious belief in 19th century theo-nomics, nor tears, will stay execution of the warrant once it is served. We had execution on December 27, 1982, and again on December 27, 1983. We can expect something in the last week of the last quarter of the year on a regular basis until we understand that some invisible hands are heavy clenched fists.

When we understand this, we can take a tip from the Dutch. No law or command of man can turn back a rising tide, yet the Dutch reclaim land from the relentless North Sea. There would be no Netherlands without the cunning hand of their workmen.

Natural change cannot and should not be thwarted; but whatever is made by the hand of man—whether visible or hidden—may by the hand of man be overturned.

The 15-percent quotas proposed by the Fair Trade in Steel Act are four times more generous than those the Europeans are now negotiating with 15 nations, who are themselves more stingy in their markets than the community. The quotas in the fair trade in steel bill are temporary. They are designed to give the American industry time—5 years—to do for itself at higher borrowing costs what every other nation does for its steel industry at low cost or no cost.

And remember, without these subsidies and this dumping the foreign steel that is coming here would be too high-priced to sell in this market, which is the only open market in the world. Without the helping hand of foreign governments, this steel could not compete here.

So I invite all in this body who are concerned about the future of America and all of its industries to review all of the record and to consider cosponsoring the fair trade in steel bill.

It would be an act of even-handedness that is called for by the times; and it would be a gesture of steady-handedness that cannot be misinterpreted, not even by our friend, Sir Roy.

And finally, it would put a finger on a big part of the problem.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude by saying that I understand in the heat of debate under special order, where my colleagues would be unable to recognize me or unwilling or probably by inadvertence. And I could not get recognition.

But I would like to take this next minute or two to put on record some of the points that I wanted to make during that debate.

And the first point I want to make is that regardless of how you cut the apple, the fact remains that the administration in Lebanon is there. They are going to have to answer to the American people. It has been the accepted policy, no matter who wants to polish the apple which way, it is the accepted historical policy in this country that he who rules has got to answer. And the administration is in Lebanon.

I did not vote for the particular resolution and I do not want to get into the really very finite but yet very complicated details involving the Marines in Lebanon. All I know is there is a Member here, my good friend from Texas, waiting to give us the result of his great study. And he has always been here during special orders. He will agree with me that nobody called me from the administration, nor him, to consult with us, when they made the decision to put the Marines in Lebanon. It was an Executive decision. And by law and under the Constitution the President had a right to do it. But once he did it, he has to answer for it.

We do have the ramifications of the War Powers Act. We had all the pros and cons of the debate and the self-wringing of hands and also the recriminations we have been hearing about. The fact remains that the administration in power is the one that is going to answer. They did it. And they have got to respond. They have to answer to it.

I remember in the past some of the debate had indicated that there were some remarks that were so viciously made in conjunction with the passage where the attempted now policy resolution, it was bad, it probably overstepped the bounds of decency here in the House. I can remember back as a Member when the Republican Party and to the man repeatedly called Jimmy Carter the worst of names and I do not want to repeat them. And they did it in every special order, every day, week after week and month after month. In fact, I think the criticism that is being directed toward the President today, because of the Lebanon situation, is mild—I repeat that, mild—compared to what the Democrats had to put up with when we had the situation in Iran and we had the situation down in the Caribbean and we had the influx of the immigrants and we had the other things that plagued the Carter administration.

Whether it is right or whether it is wrong, far be it for me to be the final word as far as that is concerned. But the fact still remains, there is a situation there. The administration must answer to the American people for what they have advocated.

I have taken my position as a matter of record and many others in the House have. I thought the Republicans in the special orders that they had handled today were very bias, they were unfair insofar as they did not allow the majority whip to respond at times. I guess that is a natural thing that occurs when one party holds the control of the time.

I wanted to make some remarks known at that time and I was not recognized.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would take umbrage with the gentleman's statement——

Mr. GAYDOS. I do not want the gentleman to do that.

Mr. HUNTER. That the majority whip did not have the opportunity to respond. I saw him respond I think in a very articulate way and I saw the majority and the minority proponents of the various positions getting together after the discussion on the floor and basically going over this problem.

I watched the discussion on the floor and the debate and the statements made by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SILJANDER) and I thought that his major point was very appropriate. And that is simply that the Syrians are presently looking at the U.S. Congress and they are looking at the resolution which is coming up very shortly and a number of Members on the Democrat side of the aisle who appear to want to leave Lebanon and the Syrians are deriving from this perception, I think, the basic attitude that they do not have to make any concessions in the negotiations that are going on right now, that if they simply sit and wait the U.S. Congress will take the Marines out of Lebanon without any concessions on their part.

I think it is obvious that if we look at Mr. Assad's position as recently articulated that that is exactly what he is doing.

Mr. GAYDOS. Well, I do not know how obvious it is, but it is obvious to me that the gentleman speaking now was not here when the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) was making his remarks, or the gentleman would not be talking that way.

Mr. HUNTER. I was speaking to Mr. SILJANDER's remarks. Those were the ones that I did see and I thought that he maintained the position very well.

Mr. GAYDOS. Well, the gentleman did not hear all the remarks. And I am primarily referring and I do refer to the gentleman's colleague who refused to yield to me. And if he were here I would refuse to yield to him. I am trying to give the gentleman the courtesy that he did not extend to me.

Let me say this to the gentleman since he brings it up. Again I want to emphasize, the administration has to answer for what it has done and advocated.

And I see this continual conspiracy on the part—strike that word—this continual effort on the part of the other party to continually defend the President. Sure they should do it. That is their right. But they do it in conjunction with trying to rap the Democratic Party with what I consider unfounded and undocumented accusations.

Let me give the gentleman an example of what I am talking about. The gentleman can go back—and I do not know how long the gentleman has been here—go back and read that RECORD as to what occurred when Mr. Carter had his problems. And I am not saying he was right or he was wrong. Go back and read the RECORD and then discern in your best judgment, for your own purposes, whether or not the accusers at that time and the critics at that time were fair to him as now being asked for fairness by Mr. WALKER, my good colleague from Pennsylvania.

I do not want to get into a debate one way or another because I do not think it is proper for me—I am not on that particular committee—but I take the position that it is very unfair to criticize the document which we know is a resolution and which, if a person reads it, we must conclude has not one vicious word in it. And that is a fact. Even if you took the normal nomenclature of any word contained in that document, there is not one vicious word in it; and to twist that around and say the Democrats are using this "vicious document," this resolution, as a highly critical document, I do not think is fair, and I think it has no justification.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a minute?

Mr. GAYDOS. I again yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTER. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Let us set a few things straight.

Mr. GAYDOS. Wait a minute. It is my time. Do you want to set me straight, or what?

Mr. HUNTER. Let us set a few facts straight.

Mr. GAYDOS. All right.

Mr. HUNTER. To start out with, you said the administration has to answer for our policy in Lebanon. We have been. The policy in Lebanon as presently exists is a policy that was approved by this House not too long ago. So it is a bipartisan policy. I think we cannot ignore the realism that in fact Lebanon is a political issue today and that it is going to be a political issue in the campaign and it is going to influence voters to vote one way or the other. You have to accept that reality. At this present time I think it is a real mistake for the Democratic Caucus or for the Republican Caucus to bring up in a nonbipartisan manner a position which is going to be interpreted by the Syrians——

Mr. GAYDOS. Let me respond to my good friend. It is my time.

Mr. HUNTER. If I could just continue my sentence.

Mr. GAYDOS. I refuse to yield any further.

Let me take one point seriatim with my good friend, and I am going to be nice to you and yield to you, like your people did not yield to me, but you are going to do it on my terms.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman allow me to finish my sentence before he takes my time away?

Mr. GAYDOS. No. I refuse to yield until I respond. If you want me to yield again, you are going to be a gentleman about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. GAYDOS. Let me just say this to the gentleman: The decision to put the Marines in place was not made in a bipartisan method here on the floor of this House. That was not the case. And no matter how many times he states it, it is not going to make it a truism. That was not the case. The President made that decision. I am not saying he was right or wrong. I am not treading in that area. I am just saying that when he made the decision, he made it. I did not make it and the House did not make it formally or informally.

If the gentleman has a misunderstanding of what occurred, I think he ought to retract his statement. That is a truism.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I will yield. And I am going to yield on one condition. Let us take one point at a time and just do not try to outtalk me. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTER. I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

Mr. GAYDOS. Be fair about it.

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to tell the gentleman that the only thing I asked for was the ability to finish my sentence, not necessarily to go on and on. Let us take the gentleman's point.

Mr. GAYDOS. I apologize if the gentleman is interpreting my interruption as being one that would prohibit him from concluding his thoughts. I do not want to do that. But let us take one point at a time.

Mr. HUNTER. OK, let us take one point at a time.

This House did vote to go along with the President's request to stay in Lebanon. So although we got into Lebanon—in fact, we came into Lebanon ostensibly under a much different policy than presently exists—the Congress did at least ratify the administration's request, and we did have a vote, and the leader of the Democratic Party did say that we should not be partisan in this issue. There have been votes on the floor of this House which have ratified the present existence of the marines in Lebanon under the War Powers Act. Now, that is a fact, is that not true?

Mr. GAYDOS. I am not questioning that at all. The only statement I made was that the original decision was the President's. I did not vote for that resolution. I do not know how you voted, but I did not vote for it. I want to make that fact a matter of record.

Mr. HUNTER. Understanding that, will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I will, if the gentleman responds seriatim point by point.

Mr. HUNTER. I agree with the gentleman. That is exactly what I am doing.

My point was that our policy under which the marines are staying in Lebanon is a policy that was arrived at—and I am talking about not what got them there in the first place but the fact that they are staying in Lebanon—by a bipartisan action. We voted on the floor of this House to go along with that.

Mr. GAYDOS. Let me respond there. The President said, as a matter of public knowledge and formally on the record, that he was going to keep the troops there regardless of whether that original resolution was passed or not. He said that repeatedly. He made the decision. And he said they would continue there until he decided. In fact, that was what was so violently debated on the floor of this House, whether or not he was going to pull them out, whether or not the War Powers Act in any respect attached to the problem. And that was the administration's stated position publicly.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. Yes.

Mr. HUNTER. If the gentleman will continue to yield, I will say that if the gentleman thinks that the reason we voted to basically ratify the President's request to keep the marines in Lebanon was because he was going to do it anyway, I think the gentleman is not informed. This was a deliberate vote by this House to keep the marines in Lebanon and not to set a date certain for their removal. And that was a bipartisan action. I do not think the gentleman, by going back to the policy and the purpose for the President first inserting the marines, can alter that fact.

I thank the gentleman for giving me time to respond to his comments on the floor. I think he has made some excellent points. I think that the major point that all of Congress should remember is that the Syrians are watching what we do on this floor, and I would hope that our actions are not going to be interpreted as manifesting a lack of resolve for the United States to help establish an independent Lebanon.

I thank the gentleman for allowing me to speak on that issue.

Mr. GAYDOS. I think the gentleman makes points that are viable. But let me say this: I happen to have spent some time in the House, and I want the Record to show at this time that I see an unfolding of repetition of fact upon fact upon fact, as has been part of the record of the Vietnam conflict, everything, from beginning to end, how we got into the matter, how we sustained ourselves, how we could not pull out of it. And I am not even saying as a matter of record today whether or not I think it is right or wrong. I am just trying to reiterate for the Record that I see everything repeating itself.

For instance, there was a statement made recently, "Oh, we cannot get out, it is impossible. We are stuck in there. Look what would happen." The next statement: "Oh, the government is getting stronger. Gemayel and all of his people there, now we have got a couple more regiments we are training, and it is going to be all right, they are going to get together, they are going to be able to defend their country, democracy is going to prevail."

I do not know whether they are right or I am. All I know is that this reiteration has all of the facets and the criticism, the justification, all of it, all repeated. In the meantime, the casualties start all over again.

I am not even saying—I do not know, and I do not think I am in a position at this time, not having specific information—whether we are in there right or wrong. All I know is that I have a great fear that we are getting into an inextricable position, that we are thrust into someplace that we cannot get ourselves out of, and reasoning is not going to prevail, because all of these things were debated on all of these issues identically 10 to 12 years ago. I happened to be sitting here listening to them and experiencing the frustration at that time.

I had hoped my colleagues would be here. They had asked for a debate. It was a good debate, I imagine, but I thought it was unfair insofar as we did not have a fair share of the time. But I just hope that reason prevails, I hope that we do find ourselves out of the morass we are in.

I hear them talking about foreign trade, as to what other countries are doing for their self-interest and what we are not doing, and trying to be fair, trying to look at the needs, internal, domestic, international needs of the countries, and how trade should be a two-way street, which it is not, and then taking into consideration not only the trade issue but also our ability to participate in the Mideast in such a controversial situation. I think it is going to take probable minds and actions of great consequence to ultimately determine what is right and wrong. But probably the reason why I am just taking these few minutes at the end of these special remarks is that I am just trying to caution my colleagues. Let us make sure that we give this very thorough consideration and that we do not repeat some steps we have taken before and that we do not end up doing something that we originally did not intend to do.

There being no one else on the floor here willing to participate in that aspect, let me close my special order with this admonition as far as trade is concerned: We met today with Secretary Baldrige, with the Steel Caucus. We did not discuss things that were of utmost secrecy, but there were some exchanges of ideas that may have far-reaching implications. We talked about what our trade policy should be as far as developing and emerging nations are concerned and the overall problem that we have in this country involving steel and steel imports and the source of them.

We looked and we saw some peculiarities take place that we talked about today in the Steel Caucus executive committee that we exhaustively discussed and debated. For instance, Japan taking the position that Korea is taking undue advantage of the international trade arrangements and agreements, GATT, and is dumping in Japan and Korea steel illegally, improperly, under existing agreements. We looked at that and tried to fit it into our problem we have here with Brazil.

We tried to fit in the Caribbean Initiative where this country, I say foolishly but others say there are justifications for it, has said, "Look, we are going to allow the Caribbean nations, because of thier very critical economic situation, to ship into this country many, many different items tariff free.

We looked at the situation in Mexico, where Mexico under international agreements has no restraints because she is not a party to GATT and, therefore, the problems with her take on a nomenclature that are very, very specific and different than others and we are looking at the overall situation as it pertains to specialty and we looked at our projected future in this country as to the viability of the domestic steel industry not only in existing economic circles and reasons and purposes, but the defense of this country.

I have repeatedly stated an example that I think is unattackable: that when the Isreali forces lost the first day of the war years back and had something like 700 or 800 tank casualties, the first country they turned to was us and we had to deplete our National Guard. We had to take all of those tanks and rush them over there by airlift so that her defensive posture would be on what would be amenable to the situation.

What are we going to do if we do not make steel in this country? Who is going to supply that steel? What happens when we give away our tool steel industry and our specialty steel, titanium, and everything that implies, all types of specialty steel, where one buys it by the pound and not by the ton, which they use in afterburners and all of our war endeavors and sophisticated weaponry.

All that depends upon specialty steel and all the ramifications of it, then, when you lose your industry. What do you do? Where do you look for the sources?

So those are things we talked about today. I am going to be taking special orders trying to explain, trying to justify, maybe at times, and hopefully trying to elucidate, for the benefit of my colleagues, what the problem is and trying to be fair, trying to be accurate, and hopefully, a self-serving declaration on my part, trying to be effective. That is what we are going to do. We are going to keep it up and be as persistent as we can, and I hope we are as persistent as my colleague, the gentleman from Texas, who has been so persistent on so many issues and has, in the long run, ultimately ended up accomplishing what he wanted to do in the first place.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I thank my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise only to compliment the gentleman for the long, sustained effort. He has shared the loneliness of these hours with some of us, and I, for one, appreciate his leadership that has led to action. If what we have now are just some vestiges of the protection the American consumer, American industry, should have had, I think in large part it has been due to his efforts, his leadership, and that of his colleagues in the Steel Caucus.

I, for one, want to record the show that I am grateful for his leadership in keeping some of us informed who do not have the direct relationship and responsibility that the gentleman has and has so ably discharged.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, because of my very personal and sincere association and also my concept and my description I have given on many occasions to my colleague from Texas, I really, sincerely, appreciate what he has said as a distinct compliment, one that I probably do not deserve, but I really appreciate that.

The gentleman does remind me that some affirmative action has occurred. We have had a Buy American, as far as the highway bill is concerned. It does mean some jobs have been saved. We did have a great debate involving the proposed northern pipeline vis-a-vis who would supply the pipe, the size pipe, and where and from, with Canada and other places. I would like to assume we have, hopefully, been instrumental in affecting or maybe influencing the fact that we do have right in place today on specialty steel some quotas. The administration has acquiesced.

It has been a lonely battle, my colleague does remind me. We have been ridiculed at times because even the area which I come from, which is very heavily unionized, has repeatedly refused to support the bill that I introduced here some 6 months ago that we call, not the Fair Steel Trade Act, but the reciprocity bill which in essence says we will do with other countries what they do with us. Our unions have repeatedly taken a position that that is not right; we should not interfere with international free trade. But now hopefully they are coming around.

But those are some of the frustrations we have had over the years.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAYDOS. I now yield to a member of the caucus, one who has been so instrumental in helping us effect some of these changes, my good friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN of California. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I am moved by the remarks of our friend, the gentleman from Texas, to add my own words to his in tribute to the leadership that the gentleman in the well has given on this very important issue through his leadership in the Steel Caucus.

I know that I have not been as faithful as he has either in my attendance or my diligence in pursuing these issues. Perhaps this is one of the reasons that we have lost the only steel mill in California, one which is in my district.

But the gentleman in the well has helped to focus the attention of the Congress on the great importance of this problem of our steel industry in this country, not only the specialty steel interests but all steel, and how vital this is to the future security and economic prosperity of this country.

I want the gentleman to know that I appreciate the work that he has done. It must compel us ultimately to take some action different from what we have been doing. We cannot allow this situation to continue, and I know that he will continue to work on it.

I just wanted to thank the gentleman for that and to pledge my continued support.

Mr. GAYDOS. I thank the gentleman. I want the record to show that the executive board member from California has supported the Steel Caucus financially, through his time, doing yeoman duty time and time again, taking from his other obligations and duties, his committee work, and participating in hearings that we have had with all types of personalities, with industry, international personalities. He was always there.

If the time the gentleman put in would have been rewarded by the number of industrial activities and factories working in his area, California would have been swamped. I say that without any reservation. California would have been swamped with the steel industry.

But we all know what happened in California. Because of the physical location, high shipping costs between California and the central part of this country and the East, and the proximity of the production and producers originating in the Far East, all this has contributed to the fact that a ton of steel lands in California cheaper than we can make it there. So even Houdini could not change that.

I also want the record to show that the Member from California who has just spoken was one of the most viable, influential and effective Members in that Steel Caucus, and many times, although he does not admit it at this point, we looked to him for leadership. I just happen to have been occupying the chair at the time. He has been a tiger, for want of a better descriptive term, in many of our endeavors and when we had our darkest moments.

Let me conclude by saying this: I do not know, I do not think the caucus knows, where we are going to go and what the ultimate results are going to be.

I do know that we have brought it down upon this question in the spotlight of enlightenment, and that we have people now participating in it. The record is very, very clear now that this is a problem touching all facets. Not only steel, but the same principles apply to anything you can envision in real life or that you know exists.

We talk about costume jewelry that we do not make in this country. We used to employ 20,000 people to make costume jewelry for all of our young ladies, and all of our costume jewelry, I think without exception, is now made overseas. Christmas tree lights and ornaments and things of that nature are all made overseas.

I am not saying that a country cannot survive because it does not make costume jewelry or it does not make Christmas tree lights, but I do say that if somebody wants to buy those things and you want to have your economy moving and be effective, people are going to have to work someplace, and everybody cannot work in the steel mills, because I say "There just ain't no more jobs there." So in order to earn that ability to purchase, they have to have jobs.

It is just like Johnny Dent used to say when he was here and used to lead this battle long before I came along. Johnny Dent used to go out there and speak to the china producers, and I even think at that time they paid him a terrific honorarium—$250. And Johnny would say—and he would bring the house down—"Let me tell you something, you go to Taiwan—and I love the Taiwanese—and you go to Japan, you go there and you visit, and you buy from them china. How many times has a Chinese national or a Taiwanese national come and sat down in your restaurant and used that cup to drink a cup of tea? Very seldom."

So he would say, "Look, you can't sell to the whole world. You've got to buy from them. You've got to be fair."

He would always make this point. This is him speaking years back. He would say, "Today here we are, we don't even make such-and-such china, a cup of this or a cup of that."

That is just not good horsesense. It has always been the basic principle under the international free trade concept. It has always been the commonsense and the fundamental of it. It has always been that way, that you sell to the world what you make, what you can produce effectively and efficiently and competitively, and they should buy from you what you make.

But that is not the case today. The whole thing has changed. We have governments which are in business today. They subsidize. We have cartels, international cartels. They get together. We have the free enterprise concept here in this country competing with the governments of Japan, Korea, Taiwan, West Germany, England, Italy, Brazil—you name it—including Mexico.

For instance, let me give a good example. An American producer needs money for capitalization. He has to go down to the bank and pay around 13 percent interest, maybe 16 percent. Give or take a little, whatever it is, he is paying high interest.

If you want to produce something like that in other countries, because of their national policy, you go down to a consortium, you go down to NITI, you put an application in, and they arrange a bank loan for you. They make a determination that you are going to be producing something that somebody else is already producing, and they set it all out for you.

That is real nice. But when it comes to competition, this Government says to our people, "You can't have two people producing. Antitrust says two people can't get together."

Like United States Steel wanted to get together and agree to buy its slabs from Bethlehem so it could keep its finishing part going down there outside of Philadelphia at the Fairless Works—well, they cannot do that in this country. You go to other countries, and they work together, hand-in-hand, glove-in-glove. It is that old fist we are talking about, the velvety glove, and it fits.

That is unfair competition. I could go on and give example after example after example. Who could in their wildest dreams ever have imagined that some country could produce—and I will give a good example—where we have like modern facilities? Our stainless steel capacity in this country is the most modern in the world. It is admitted in international circles that the most modern, up-to-date stainless steel production capacity right now rests in this country. It is phenomenal, but that is what happened.

Now, on steel, we had to give them protection. Why? Because of that old criticism that "you have antiquated production facilities and that is why you can't compete." That is a bunch of baloney. There we have it. They could not compete, because they made it and they are making it in my district and in other districts. Allegheny Ludlum is one of them. It is the most modern.

We had to give them protection, and the protections are in place today. Why do we have to do it, even with the most modern steel production? Because Sweden, West Germany, Brazil, and all these other countries start dumping on them and selling below cost.

This is not me talking; it is a matter of record found by the International Trade Commission.

Now, our country and our industries cannot compete, and we are not going to be able to compete under those conditions. We have been asking for years—and my good friend, the gentleman from California, knows this—asking for years, give us a U.S. national policy. Give us some direction over here. Let our bankers make arrangements with steel to give them reasonable interest rates, if that is the case. Let them participate on an equal competitive footing with foreign countries. Let us not always bring antitrust suits against them. Let us not always provide a forum whereby our people are asked to pay these high rates while other countries are encouraged and financed by their governments' participation.

I can go on and on and on with example after example. I just want to say this for the record: In this country more than half of our shoes are imports. Whether they come from Taiwan, Hong Kong, Italy, or France, over half of them are imports. That might be good or that might be bad, but the fact remains that that is not the only item. I can go down to the textile people, I can go down to the television industry, I can go down and cite each individual industry.

I say if we do not do something, if we do not have a national steel policy, if we do not get a reasonable interpretation, an application of the pertinent international trade sanctions, with GATT and all of its ramifications and international trade agreements, formal and informal, if we do not do these things, we are in for some very serious trouble. Economic trouble is going to then take place and be part of our internal military lack of capability, our military problems, with the commitments we have throughout the world.

Like John Dent used to say—and I am going to close with this little ditty of his—he used to say repeatedly, "You know, we can't live in this country if I wash your underwear and you turn around and wash my underwear because none of us are going to have any money to pay anybody."

So we have to have a diversification, we have to have a healthy international situation, and that is what we are striving to do. Whether we are successful is going to depend on our ability to enlighten and educate our colleagues. It is going to depend upon the ability of an enlightened administration, and internationally, in the worldwide family of nations, hopefully and ultimately, we are going to get a real good workable international agreement, GATT, and make it work. Hopefully we can work that out. I am a free trader, and I think all of us are. It is just a matter of how we arrive at it.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues for participating, and I apologize for taking the time because I know my colleagues also anxiously want to make their points.

BORROWING OUR CHILDREN'S FUTURE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, the Congress is now considering a topic of extreme importance to our children and grandchildren—the Federal deficit. I am concerned that we are shortchanging the children of America by borrowing against the future. If the deficit is not reduced, our children will be burdened with a heavy load of our making.

Three years ago, the national debt was approximately $740 billion. By 1983, however, the national debt totaled $1.3 trillion. By 1989, the national debt is projected to exceed $2.1 trillion. This is no way to plan for America's future. We must build our country's future on a solid foundation.

But a foundation cannot be built on a mountain of debts. We all hope to leave our grandchildren a valuable legacy when we die. If the current Federal spending level is maintained, we will leave nothing but debts to pay. The share of the national debt for each of the 63.4 million children under 18 in the United States today totals $20,400. At the average interest rate of 10.4 percent on the national debt, the annual interest on that debt is over $2,100. In 1989, the share of the debt for each child will total $32,900.

The Federal deficit is large and grows larger every day. We must start to control it, or it will control our children and our grandchildren. We borrow today, but they must pay tomorrow. Because of us, they will suffer.

The Reagan administration has promised to take action to lower the Federal deficit. I am appalled that the President has failed to make any effort to reduce the already huge Federal deficit. What will our children do if no action is taken on the deficit now? While President Reagan has spoken openly about the need to reduce Government spending, this budget proposes a deficit of $193 billion for next year—an increase of $10 billion from the borrowing estimate for fiscal year 1984. The President's own advisers have warned that if the deficit is not reduced more than currently proposed, high inflation and interest rates will mark our future economy.

The President apparently did not follow his advisers' recommendations. The budget proposal does not contain a constructive plan to lower the deficit. The cuts Reagan promised have not materialized. This strategy saddles our children with the bill for our irresponsibility. And I am afraid our children might not be able to pay.

Deficit figures have real meaning for our grandchildren. We might not live long enough to see the next generation deal with the deficit problem—but we can bet that they will struggle. It has been estimated that in the coming 6 years the national debt will increase by $1.3 trillion. That figure is too large to sufficiently grasp, but its effect cannot be ignored. It means that we will increase the burden on our children by $12,500 in the next 6 years. We are borrowing, not from ourselves, but from them.

If we do not solve the deficit problem, our current recovery will be stopped even as it is about to begin. I urge my colleagues to carefully examine the budget to determine how best to decrease the deficit, for we must do so. Not for our sake. For our children's sake.●

UPDATE ON SITUATION IN THE AIRLINE INDUSTRY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, last December 14 during the break at home I had occasion to meet with several representatives of the airline pilots formerly employed by Continental Airlines, out on strike at the time, and they continue to be so striking.

That was one of the most pathetic and sad meetings I ever had the responsibility of attending. It was open to the press. This so emotionalized these pilots that they wrote out a statement in which it said they were thanking me for just meeting with them.

Incidentally, none of them is a constituent. So the politics of the situation I think can be truthfully be sort of minimal.

Among other things they identified themselves as Capt. John Gonzales, no relative of mine. His name is spelled with an "s" at the end. Also first Officer Dan James, Capt. Roger Lininger, and Capt. Ray Tschirhart. Every one of these gentleman is what everybody else would call conservative; they all supported Ronald Reagan for election and have learned the hard way what I think all through history free citizens have to learn over and over, the lesson that freedom is never won permanently. No country assures it, no matter how wonderful the institutions are that it may have, such as ours. It is something that each generation has to win in its own way.

Following the demise of the Braniff Corp. which had a lot more activity in and out of my district than Continental had had, and which also involved more employees in my immediate area of representation, but again none of those affected in San Antonio, and those in the case of Braniff amounted to about 200 employees; none was in my district. They all lived in those districts represented by other colleagues.

Frankly, at one time the district I had the honor of representing, the 20th, consisted on the entire county. So I have had experience in representing the entire configuration of Bexar County, with all of its cosmopolitan and pluralistic aspects. This is often forgotten today.

So that many, of the residents of those areas consider themselves still in the 20th District. And for whatever reason,they feel they have access to the 20th District.

In the case of Braniff, I am convinced that no Nation, no society that permits to happen what did happen to those hapless employees, from airline pilots to flight attendants to mechanics to airline attendants at the desks at an airport, they were left stranded one morning. They received a call and were told no matter whether they were a mechanic working at a hangar, or a pilot awaiting to depart in London or a flight attendant rushing to her duties, or anybody else in the employment of Braniff, they were told at 10 a.m. one day, and it will be 2 years this summer, that they had no job and that they might as well go home and that the paycheck due them that day, maybe, they would receive sometime in the future.

Now, some never got it. They were employees whom I have gotten to know because in the 22 years and 1 month now that I have been in this congress I have kept my base at home and I have attempted to go back every weekend when we are in session.

So that means that I have put in better than 8,500,000 miles just between here and my district in San Antonio. So I have known pilots who are now retired, some who have passed on; I have known engineers; I have known flight attendants who have formed families; and I am intimately familiar with the problems of those employees and the aspects of modern-day American air travel which I think is a glory of the world today, despite its deterioration under so-called deregulation, which has given rise to these things that I am bringing to the attention of the Congress.

The Braniff experience was something that was quite traumatic to me. I thought those practices had died with the robber barons of the last century or at the turn of the century, or before the depression. But I never dreamed that they would happen in our day and time with all the anguish, the injustice still reeking and spilling over in our society, maybe not perceptive to the overwhelming preponderant number of Americans but one by one, one segment following another.

At that time, the Braniff case, it was everybody that was in an employee capacity. The laws? The laws are not shaped for working folks. The Congress still does not respond to working folks. It is so hard to defend the interests of the average working man, in fact impossible. If you are talking about an $8 billion bill for IMF, well, that zooms by. But if you are talking about revising the bankruptcy laws so that what is happening to these pilots, helplessly trying to protest in the case of Continental Airlines, and several other corporations who fiendishly, and their lawyers discovered these loopholes in the bankruptcy law, whereby an airline corporation like Continental is declared bankrupt while it has over $50 million in the till.

So that we have the ludicrous situation of having a corporation declare itself bankrupt, but not broke. But for only one single-minded purpose and that is to cheat the worker, to rob the wage earner of his wage. That I say is intolerable in any society under any form of government, capitalistic, socialistic, communistic, no society will long endure with those injustices. Yes, there are ripples now, a ripple barely perceptible, but let me remind my colleagues that all momentous events in every time in history, in every land, in every country, going back as long as man has written history, no society long stands with those manifest injustices going unaddressed and unredressed, as the Continental pilots now are facing injustice and suffering intolerable situations. They do not have limitless ability to remain alive and well in our structured society, fighting a tremendous corporate array, a corporation that uses these laws in order to twist them to the detriment of the worker, their profit.

We live in a period of time in which the conjunction of events, you have our three great organs of government, under the Constitution and our tradition, coequal, separate and supposedly independent. I think the recent talk they called debate about the Lebanon situation, before that Vietnam, before that Korea, should tell us whether this the first branch under the Constitution is in effect independent and coequal, but has not been now reduced to secondary meaningless, frustrating activities and speechifying such as in those legislatures construed in the Republics of France that went under and in times of crisis could not rise were not responsive to the people's needs. And those critical junctions even in our own mother country that gave us the institutions that we enjoy.

In every country the record is identical. And in every land even today no matter what form of government, even in the most authoritative, the only danger the modern totalitarian states have hit as to an upheaval as some are facing now in what we consider to be obliterative self-contained authoritative despotic societies, let me assure my colleagues that even there the injustice perpetrated on the great masses of working men and women are beginning to shake those regimes, whether it is China or whether it is Russia.

But I address myself to you and to me because we are talking about our country and our boasted freedom that still permits these injustices, grievous injustices.

Here is an all-American father, exemplary family man, worked now with Braniff since he was discharged from the Air Force in San Antonio. What happened to him? I happen to know the family well because I would always see him at the counter. As a matter of fact, I was using Braniff before he was hired.

But I had occasion to be invited to some blue and gold ceremonies for the Cub Scouts. I identify greatly with the movement and have for years. And his two boys of this particular American—and I am not talking about an ethnic minority or anything like that, I am talking about a plain average good, solid all-American family and head of family. Met his two boys. And then he gets the call.

So what has happened in the interim? Still looking for a job. Braniff has announced, thanks to the Hotel Corp. that has taken over with some financial combination, that they are going to renew some flight service, perhaps on March 1. But it is so fragmentary that everyone of these individuals who have yet to line up a full-time other than marginal job are hopeful that maybe they will be one of the few that might go back to work.

But in the meanwhile, what has happened to that family? Well, the father has had to take the jobs that he can get. Moonlighting here, moonlighting there, driving a truck for a bakery, submarginally employed. Compelling the mother of these very wonderful children to go out to work, also submarginally employed in the economy that San Antonio offers. In order to do what? To keep their home, keep the roof over their head. His unemployment compensation did not last that long.

I say that if this is what we call free enterprise then I do not want to know what free enterprise is. It might be private enterprise, but it certainly is not free enterprise. And if free enterprise can say that in order for it to be called free enterprise it has to do these things, it has to cheat its workers, it has to abandon with no conscience whatsoever entire families, then I say that is not what I want to be. And I do not care what anybody makes of that. If that be treason, make the most of it.

After all, I see a constant mixture of words. Mix free enterprise with private enterprise. Let me remind my colleagues Mussolini and Hitler had private enterprise until the day they died. You tell me they had free enterprise. But it was private.

So I say that with respect to the Braniff employees. Then comes Continental and in a most heinous way. But both airlines down and out for the same reason and that is that the men in power, greedy by nature, demanding and thinking they could compete for more power against the real heavies in the industry, once the cop was taken off the corner, then it was like throwing a flyweight in the ring with a heavyweight. You do not have to be a prophet to know what is going to happen. And that is what has happened. And the greed of it all.

In a bankruptcy proceeding, section 11, you have reorganization. For the first time in such a case Continental stock, after the reorganization was announced, went up 25 percent. The President, who is more interested in manipulating stock deals, in trying to speculate, not manage and administer an airline, more interested in those quicky deals, these so-called merger deals, these so-called speculative efforts in stocks, himself with a dire conflict of interest as president of Continental and as the head and one of the principal owners of a sort of a dummy corporation he set up in New York and then the interplay of his stock interests.

Well, if we had a Justice Department that might remotely think it had a responsibility, which is too much to expect under this administration, that clearly has indicated what it protects. And it is this kind of tactic that it accepts. And it has wrecked all the antitrust administration in the Justice Department. There is no such thing anymore in our country.

So there again as in the case of other activites which I have expounded on on this floor, the average American is stripped naked of any protection that our whole apparatus of government has been constructed and intended to be there for his protection. And I speak here without exempting the Congress because this is an integral part of our Government.

And we have abandoned those who need the Government the most in favor of their exploiters, what Franklin Roosevelt called those malefactors of great wealth.

The airlines pilots thanked me. As they said: "Thank you and your good offices for being instrumental in assisting us in this conference"—meaning that for the first time it attracted some news coverage where their plight would at least be reported.

Anytime I see a man such as Capt. Ray Tschirhart on a picket line, my friends, that is the time I know we have reached a great period of upheaval. Ray Tschirhart, why, his family name is a historical household name in my area. I grew up with that nucleus of families that were descendents of the German colonizers of 140, 150 years ago that brought into that area the first scientists, the first great scientific cultivators, the first biologists, and great, great wealth to the communities. You do not get a man like Capt. Ray Tschirhart to take the picket sign unless there has been great commotion and great injustice. And I say that we have a heavy responsibility—I think it has been announced that maybe we will have the so-called amendments to the Bankruptcy Act—if we do not plug those heinous loopholes that so fiendishly have been taken advantage by these lawyers and these greedy speculators, heedless of any human prior need. Then we are equally remiss. I would like to say, for one, that I am reexamining the whole issue of employment security in industries that are undergoing structural changes. That is one reason why I did not vote for these so-called regulatory bills.

I also offer at this point in the RECORD the remarks I made on the occasion of my meeting with the gentlemen, followed by a letter I then addressed to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Honorable PETER RODINO, and also a copy of the remarks then presented to me by the airline pilots representing the association, Capt. John Gonzales, First Officer Dan James, Capt. Roger Lininger, and Capt. Ray Tschirhart, and also a copy of the release made by the Continental pilots on December 15, 1983, in Houston, Tex.:

STATEMENT OF U.S. REPRESENTATIVE HENRY B. GONZALEZ, DECEMBER 14, 1983

I am very concerned about the novel ways that bankruptcy laws are now being used to avoid clear legal obligations, and specifically concerned about how bankruptcy is being used to break valid labor contracts, thereby frustrating the law and seriously undermining the ability of American employees to bargain in good faith and ensure that employment contracts are lived up to.

One way that the bankruptcy law is being used to avoid legal obligations is illustrated by the Manville case. In this situation, we have a perfectly healthy company, and two similar companies, taking bankruptcy in order to stop liability suits against them. These companies, all in the asbestos business, are in no financial danger; they are using the bankruptcy law as a protective device, to try and guarantee that they don't have to face liability for damages suffered by people who have been exposed to asbestos. This type of bankruptcy filing is already known as a protective bankruptcy, and what it represents is not the use of the bankruptcy law as a means to permit a troubled company to reorganize financially, but instead the use of the law as a means to escape legal responsibility for past conduct.

The bankruptcy law is also being commonly used to destroy labor agreements. In fact, companies that want to cut wages, or companies that want to avoid wage increases are routinely threatening to take bankruptcy rather than run the risk of a strike or bargain in good faith. In other cases, companies with labor contracts that they do not want to honor are simply filing bankruptcy and declaring agreements null and void. There are a number of these cases, most outstanding of which is Continental Airlines.

The present law is not clear on when a company can use bankruptcy to kill a labor agreement. Because the law is not clear, Congress needs to establish a policy on the question of when and under what conditions a bankrupt can abrogate a labor contract.

I have written a letter to the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, requesting that an urgent review of the bankruptcy law be made, and that Congress establish standards regarding the conditions under which a labor contract can be modified or abrogated in a bankruptcy proceeding. The need is clear.

Earlier this year, the country's largest processor of pork, Wilson Foods, declared bankruptcy in order to cut labor costs. The company's employee union renegotiated its contract, with the result that pay was cut about 25 percent. The alternative was to let the bankruptcy continue and take a cut of 40 percent.

The San Jose, California, school district, took bankruptcy in order to avoid making full payment to its teachers, after losing an arbitration decision.

In a case now before the Supreme Court, a New Jersey firm tried to use bankruptcy to cancel a labor agreement.

By far the biggest and most blatant case, however, is Continental Airlines.

In 1982, Continental's pilots signed an agreement with the company that represented a $100 million giveback. But Continental continued to lose money, and last summer the company demanded an additional $150 million in labor savings from its employees. Of that amount, the company wanted the pilots to give up $60 million and the flight attendants $40 million. When the negotiations didn't move fast enough, Continental filed for bankruptcy, cut its operations back to about one-third, of the former level, and cut employee pay by 50 percent. There is no question that Continental was having problems; but as the recent and successful negotiations that Eastern Airlines had with its employees show, it could have resolved those problems without using bankruptcy as a bludgeon.

Continental's employees were, in fact, willing to negotiate labor saving agreements. Before the bankruptcy, the flight attendants had offered a package that came very close to meeting the dollar savings that the company wanted. The pilots had earlier demonstrated their good faith by taking huge givebacks in the previous year, and were willing to do so again. But the company clearly wanted to get out of any agreement whatever, and convert itself to a nonunion carrier. Therefore it used bankruptcy to destroy contracts, avoid negotiation, and generally evade its responsibilities to the majority of cities it served, as well as the public that was left with millions of dollars worth of useless tickets.

When should a company be able to use bankruptcy to modify a labor agreement?

The courts are in disagreement, and there is in the current term of the Supreme Court a case pending that may partially resolve the question.

One lower court has said that an employer in bankruptcy can cancel labor agreements merely by showing that the contracts are burdensome. But that is something like saying that a bankrupt can avoid payment of debts merely because they are burdensome, without regard to the real ability to pay. Another court says that a bankrupt should be able to cancel a labor agreement only if that is the only way to prevent collapse of the business. And in arguments before the Supreme Court, the government says that there should be some requirement for good faith negotiation, between the bankrupt and the employees.

I don't believe this question of fundamental policy should be left completely to the courts. Congress has a responsibility.

In my letter to Chairman Rodino, I suggest that the standard ought to be this: a bankrupt employer could modify labor agreements, only if that was the only way to avoid collapse, and then only if there were good faith negotiations. Otherwise, there is not a labor agreement in existence that is worth the paper it is written on. Furthermore, there would be a widespread use of bankruptcy to avoid even good faith bargaining.

But more needs to be done.

The Federal bankruptcy statute should be amended to require that airlines pay off ticketholders before they can obtain bankruptcy shelter. In the case of Continental, a company with $50 million in the bank was able to leave passengers with millions of dollars worth of tickets stranded, and with little or no hope of ever getting their money back. If airlines like Continental and Braniff had been required to honor their obligations to passengers, bankruptcy might have been a far less attractive deal for them. Therefore, I am supporting a bill (H.R. 4558) that would require airlines to pay off their ticketholders before being able to lock up their cash holdings from creditors. This bill was introduced by my colleague from Colorado, Pat Schroeder, and it represents one way of insuring that the general public has some reasonable protection against bankruptcy artists.

Finally, I am reexamining the whole issue of employment security in industries that are undergoing structural changes.

Airline employees are supposed to have some protection against the adverse effects of deregulation; if they are displaced, they are supposed to get preferential hiring rights at other airlines. If they are affected by a big shrinkage of their company, they are supposed to get cash benefits—as provided in the 1978 Deregulation Act. But those benefits have never been effectively available, and in fact, the Civil Aeronautics Board is only now beginning to consider the applications for help by Braniff employees who have been grounded since May, 1982.

It is not just airline employees who are caught in a bind. Bus drivers and truck drivers face large pay cuts and vast layoffs as competition heats up in those lines of business.

There are almost 31,000 interstate truck lines today, which is a 70 per cent increase just since 1980. One result is that freight costs are lower today, but another result is that about a third of the unionized drivers have been laid off.

Throughout the transportation business, we have more people working, but working for less and less. In the short run, this may create some lower prices for some people, but in the long run, we face the threat that only the big hubs of the nation will get adequate service (because that's where the high volume is) while the rest of the country has little service at high prices. Another problem is that we may end up with a handful of supercarriers—as is happening in the rail business—with the result that the public will pay whatever the big carriers demand. In short, we have to look at this business of deregulation from more than a short-run, self-interest view. We have to look at whether ultimately we are going to have the same kind of good service we get today, at reasonable costs, or whether we will get less and less service for more and more. Anyone who has seen what is happening in the rail business will testify what happens to captive shippers. What we need to ask ourselves today is not whether it's just the employees of transportation companies who are being nailed to the wall; we have to look ahead and see whether or not we are the next victims. If the rail experience is any lesson, we—the general public—will be the next victims.

It may be tempting to say that the concerns of Continental's employees are no business of ours. But the harsh fact of the matter is that unless we think and act carefully, it will be the general public that next feels the bit.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 9, 1983.

Hon. PETER RODINO,
Chairman, Committee on Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I know of your great and abiding concern about the need to restructure the Bankruptcy Courts, so that the authority of these courts can be clarified. Urgent as that task is, however, there is also a need to review some of the novel ways in which large corporate interests are seeking to apply bankruptcy statutes. In some of these instances, while the law is not clear, the abusive intent of the applicants is. I refer specifically to the growing use of so-called protective bankruptcy filings: situations in which companies in good financial health use bankruptcy to frustrate legal claims or enforce unilateral actions in violation of contractual obligations.

One outstanding example, still in litigation, is the Manville case, in which a company with vast financial resources and robust business health has filed for bankruptcy as a means of cutting off claims against the company arising from exposure to asbestos. Surely, there is no threat to the company except potential claims. I would question whether the law was ever intended to be used as a protective shelter against valid claims. Surely the use of bankruptcy to estop legal liability represents a novel, potentially abusive application of the bankruptcy statutes.

I am likewise gravely concerned about the use of bankruptcy statutes as a way to abrogate valid labor contracts. One such case, National Labor Relations Board v. Bildisco and Bildisco, is pending before the Supreme Court in the current term. Two other situations, Wilson Foods and Continental Airlines, however, suggest that there is a broad trend toward companies employing bankruptcy filings as an ultimate weapon against contracts that they deem inconvenient or burdensome, without regard to the fact that such contracts were voluntarily entered into, or for that matter might have represented substantial concessions by the unions concerned.

The Bildisco matter may dispose, at least in part, of the question of when a company may abrogate its union contracts as part of a bankruptcy matter. In that case, decisions below suggest that a contract can be abrogated only as a last resort.

Contrary decisions suggest that contracts can be effectively cancelled if they are merely burdensome. But lower court decisions do not speak to the question of whether an employer is obliged to negotiate in good faith, so that employees can maintain some shred of bargaining rights.

Although some would suggest that Congress should not legislate on these issues, it seems to me that we have a clear obligation to review the question of when and under what circumstances labor contracts can be killed through resort to bankruptcy. Nothing makes the urgency of this matter so clear as the Continental Airlines case, now pending.

Continental had a valid contract with its pilots and cabin attendants. The pilots' contract included $100 million in concessions to the company. However, Continental continued experiencing losses, and demanded huge new concessions, amounting to $60 million from pilots and $40 million from cabin attendants. There is little evidence that either the pilots or cabin attendants were unwilling to make substantial concessions. The cabin attendants, for example, made an offer that represented between $35 and $43 million worth of concessions. It appears that had the company been willing to negotiate in good faith, it could have obtained the relief it needed to stay in business. However, Continental elected to file for bankruptcy, immediately slashed its route system substantially, and cut pay by about half. The company chairman thereafter said that his cost cutting goals had not only been met, but exceeded, by filing for bankruptcy.

There can be no question that Continental was facing serious financial problems. Yet the company had resources to stay in business for a considerable period of time. In discussing his demands with employees, the company chairman declared that he must either have agreement with his wage and work rule changes, or that he would take steps to preserve the company's assets. Though his statement to employees did not say so, it is clear in retrospect that he already had bankruptcy in mind, as the sure way to allow unilateral action.

The Railway Labor Act applies to the Continental case. It specifies when and in what manner the terms and conditions of employment may be changed. Though Continental has made gestures toward following that statute, it is absolutely clear that every principle of employment contracting and employee bargaining has been violated by the company.

The question for Congress is when and under what conditions companies can use bankruptcy to avoid clear legal obligations. If Continental succeeds, there is not a labor contract in the country that could be said to be worth the paper it is written on. Indeed, if the courts hold, in Bildisco, that a contract need only be burdensome to qualify for abrogation in a bankruptcy, the way would be clear for any company to repeal contracts without regard to the actual ability of the enterprise to support such agreements. Moreover, in the case of Continental, court approval of that filing would signal that no company, even one in relatively good financial health, need ever bargain in good faith. I do not believe an issue as fundamental as the right of effective collective bargaining, and the enforceability of good faith contracts, should be left wholly to the courts for settlement. It is a matter that requires legislative clarification.

Even though I know that you would prefer not to alter the bankruptcy statutes until legislation has been enacted with respect to the structure of the bankruptcy courts, I believe that the issue of so-called protective bankruptcy is so broad, and its implications so enormous, that consideration should be given to amending the law in order to provide clear protection to the public from corporate raiders who would use the bankruptcy laws to avoid their plain obligations, or to frustrate the rights of employees to bargain in good faith and obtain contracts that are enforceable.

I would respectfully suggest that your committee undertake an urgent review of the phenomenon of so-called protective bankruptcy, with a view toward preventing abuse of the bankruptcy laws.

For example, I do not believe that Congress ever intended that a bankruptcy filing could be used not only to abrogate existing labor contracts, but vitiate the laws pertaining to collective bargaining. It seems to me that the only time bankruptcy should be available as a way to vitiate labor contracts would be in situations where the company is clearly going to fail unless agreements are changed. Even in such cases, there should be some standard for consultation and negotiation. The danger is that unless Congress acts, the meaning of the law will be unclear for years to come—during which time there would be growing confusion and chaos regarding the right of employees to bargain effectively, and to have their contracts honored. Surely Congress cannot stand idly while bankruptcy laws are used as a bludgeon against all previously written laws.

I hope and urge that the committee undertake an immediate review of the so-called protective bankruptcy phenomenon, with a view toward preventing the abuse of bankruptcy laws in ways that frustrate those with valid legal claims against a company, or in ways that permit the wholesale negation of collective bargaining and contract rights.

Sincerely,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

CONGRESSMAN GONZALEZ: The Airlines Pilots Association, of 34,000 members, Capt. John Gonzales, first officer Dan James, Capt. Roger Liniger, and myself, Capt. Ray Tschirhart would like to call special attention and thanks to you and your good offices for being instrumental in assisting us in this news conference.

As you know Continental Airlines filed for chapter 11 under the Federal Bankruptcy Code on September 24, 1983. What is generally unknown is why this was done, other than the thinly veiled explanation of the corporate president who is intent on violating the National Labor Relations Act: The Federal Railway Act, the agreements with his employees, and even abusing the intent of Congress which enacted all three pieces of legislation.

After being granted protection from its creditors under the Bankruptcy Code they reopened their doors three days later calling itself the New Continental Airlines. Having voided employee contracts, withheld September paychecks for work already completed, issued worthless paychecks for August, canceled employee health insurance, suspended retirement plans, and many other basic benefits, the new company resumed operations with the same management, the same aircraft, and same airport slots, the same headquarters, and $50 million cash in hand.

The only new wrinkle at Continental was a devilishly contrived plan to recruit new pilots and flight attendants who were asked to work for only half of the normal wages paid by most of the nation's airlines. all of this came about after a quote from Mr. Stephen Wolf, then president of Continental, who cited last year's negotiations of the pilot agreement as "one of the most unusual negotiations between labor and management in any industry." A contract which eliminated pay raises of 10 percent in October of 1981, 5 percent in April 1982, and 5 percent in October of 1983. A total of 193 pilots were furloughed to improve productivity, and the pilots group forfeited its contribution to the pension fund, saving the company a great deal of money for a 1 year period". Today our pilots are the most productive of any in the industry. Obviously Mr. Wolf did not agree with or could not condone the false bankruptcy filing and the restarting of the New Continential Airlines and refused to squeeze through the alleged loop holes the lawyers think they have found in the Federal Bankruptcy Code.

Besides the employees, stockholders, and many creditors there is a group of victims for whom no one speaks. They are thousands of consumers who purchased Continental tickets with their cash, and then had their investment rendered worthless by virtue of the bankruptcy. The injustice is redoubled because the Bankruptcy Court recently released $40 million to Continental to help finance its operations. Meanwhile, those who purchased Continental tickets by cash or check have not been repaid one cent of the $28 million they are owed, while Continental continues to operate on money from worthless tickets they have sold and refuse to refund.

It must be recognized that there is a danger in making reorganization in bankruptcy too attractive to airline executives.

There is evidence that management may be using bankruptcy laws to solve business problems such as unwanted employee agreements. The example of the Continental Airlines bankruptcy is all too clear and a public awareness to this will be a beginning step to a disincentive to such abuses of employees, creditors and consumers alike.

CONTINENTAL PILOTS WARN CONSUMERS: THINK TWICE BEFORE FLYING THE "NEW CONTINENTAL"

HOUSTON, TEX.—The Continental Airline Pilot's Association today warned the flying public to think twice before flying the "New Continental Airlines" over the Christmas holiday season.

At a press conference in Houston with Congressman Gonzalez the pilots charged the "New Continental" with violating consumer rights and jeopardizing the safe operation of the airline since filing for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Federal Bankruptcy Law.

In making the charges, Dennis Higgins, chairman of the Houston based Continental pilots, said that thousands of passengers across the country have lost millions of dollars of holding Continental tickets that became worthless when the airline declared bankruptcy on September 24th.

Capt. Higgins noted that although the airline continues to operate under the name the "New Continental", these consumers have been forced to file claims with the bankruptcy court to recover their money, and that it could be months, if not years, before they receive refunds.

Higgins also cited a number of alleged safety violations that have occurred on the "New Continental" since reorganization, including the recent incident in Denver where a rookie captain landed on an active taxiway instead of the runway. Higgins questioned whether the "New Continental" is a safe airline and told passengers to know "all the facts" before choosing to fly the "New Continental" at Christmas.

Capt. Higgins also announced support for Congressman Gonzalez efforts to correct the problems of the Continental bankruptcy and to protect the consumer. Higgins said that Congressman Gonzalez efforts to correct this country's bankruptcy laws would go a long way toward preventing the consumer abuses and safety violations • • • on Congress to give the issue immediate attention upon returning in January.

"The "New Continental" has given the entire aviation industry a black eye," Capt. Higgins said. "It's operations are chaotic and unsafe, its abuse of the airline consumer is inexcusable."

Finally, Capt. Higgins announced that Continental Pilots will be available at Houston International Airport during the peak holiday travel days to assist any consumers who might be bumped from "New Continental" flights or otherwise inconvenienced.

I say, Mr. Speaker, woe to those that cheat the laborer of his hire. Woe to us if we turn our backs to the least in favor of the powerful, the rich, and the influential.

"(B) the extent to which individuals with varying handicapping conditions were served;

"(C) the types of services provided;

"(D) the sources of funding;

"(E) the percentage of resources committed to each type of service provided;

"(I) the extent of catalytic activities to promote community awareness, involvement, and assistance;

"(J) the extent of outreach efforts and the impact of such efforts; and

"(K) a comparison, when appropriate, of prior year(s) activities with most recent year activities.".

(b) Section 711 of the Act is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e)(1) The Commissioner shall, not later than February 1, 1985, develop and publish standards for evaluation consistent with the provisions in subparagraph (c)(3) to assist each independent living center receiving funding under this title to review and evaluate the operation of its center.

"(2) The Commissioner shall, under the authority specified in section 14 of this Act, conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the Centers for Independent Living Grant Program, and submit a report no later than February 1, 1986, to Congress on the evaluation, including recommendations for the improvement and continuation of each grantee and for the support of new independent living centers. In conducting the comprehensive evaluation, the Commissioner shall apply standards for evaluation which are consistent with the standards required in paragraph (1).

"(3) In developing standards for evaluation to be used by the grantees, and in developing the standards for evaluation to be used in the comprehensive evaluation, the Commissioner shall obtain and consider recommendations for such standards from national organizations representing handicapped individuals and independent living programs; and from independent living centers, professionals serving handicapped individuals, and individuals, associations, and organizations engaged in research in independent living.

"(4) No standards may be established under this subsection unless the standards are approved by the National Council on the Handicapped. The Council shall approve the standards within 90 days after receiving the standards. If the Secretary of Education has not received notification of approval or disapproval from the Council within the 90 days, the standards shall be deemed approved. A Council decision on such standards shall occur at a regularly scheduled meeting of the Council, and shall be the result of a simple majority of those present at the meeting.

"(f) Grantees receiving assistance under this section in the fiscal year in which the Rehabilitation Amendments of 1984 are enacted shall continue to receive assistance through September 30, 1986, unless the Commissioner determines that there is a substantial failure to comply with the provisions of the approved application.".

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1340) to revise and extend the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and to extend the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, and for other purposes, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment struck out all of the text of the Senate bill and inserted a substitute text.

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House with an amendment which is a substitute for the Senate bill and the House amendment. The provisions of the Senate bill, the House amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying changes.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION SERVICES

DEFINITION OF A HANDICAPPED INDIVIDUAL

The Senate bill amends the definition of a handicapped individual for the purposes of title I of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, as amended, (hereinafter, the Act) by defining an "individual" as a person who has reached the age of sixteen.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

ANNUAL REPORT REQUIREMENTS

The Senate bill provides that the Commissioner of the Rehabilitation Services Administration (hereinafter, the Commissioner) shall collect annually the following data on each client served: age, sex, race, ethnicity, education, type of disability, severity of disability, key rehabilitation process dates, earnings before and after services, work status, occupation, cost of services, types of services provided, reasons for closure, types of facilities or agencies which furnished services and whether each such facility or agency is public or private. The Commissioner shall ensure the confidentiality of the identity of each client.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

The conferees agree that a proven strength of the vocational rehabilitation program is its ability to be measured not only by its cost-effectiveness, but also in terms of its impact on the lives of individuals served. In addition to the primary objective of employment, the provision of rehabilitation services results in other positive aspects which can and should be documented. For instance, the educational level of an individual can be raised or the independence level can be increased. The conferees support the collection of this data through the "Life Status Indicators" section of the Vocational Rehabilitation Program Impact Recording Form.

In addition to supporting the requirement of individual client data, the conferees consider the information which has been available in the "Annual Vocational Rehabilitation Program/Cost Report", RSA Reporting Form RSA-2, essential to the provision of quality rehabilitation services and the effective management of rehabilitation agencies. The conferees are in agreement that the Commissioner shall continue to collect this data, which includes information on the expenditure of both State matching and Federal funds by State Rehabilitation Agencies for administrative costs, services purchased from both public and private rehabilitation facilities, counseling and placement, and other specific services such as evaluation, total restoration, training, post-employment and maintenance, and the number of services purchased. This information is vital to State agency administrators, the persons served by the rehabilitation agencies, to oversight bodies within the United States Congress and State legislatures, as well as to the Executive branches of both Federal and State governments. Form RSA-2 is the only document which provides these specific breakdowns of cost to the vocational rehabilitation program.

STANDARDS FOR EVALUATION

The Senate bill amends section 14 of the Act to require the Secretary of the Department of Education (hereinafter, the Secretary) to establish and use standards for evaluation. Such standards shall include, to the extent feasible, for all appropriate programs information relating to increases in employment and earnings, taking into account economic factors in the area served and characteristics of individuals served. The bill also requires an evaluation of projects with industry, funded under part B of title VII of the Act, by September 30, 1984. The evaluation of independent living centers is to include an assessment of alternative means of financing. Interim report of these studies would be required to be submitted to the Congress every 90 days and a final report would be required by December 31, 1984.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes with an amendment deleting from the amendment to section 14 the specific requirement for the evaluation studies of projects with industry and independent living centers. In amendments to sections 621 and 711 of the Act the House provides for specific evaluation studies of projects with industry and independent living centers.

REFERENCES TO DEPARTMENTS AND OFFICIALS

The Senate bill updates references to Federal departments and department heads to reflect changes made by the establishment of the Department of Education and the Office of Personnel Management.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

STATE REHABILITATION PROGRAM: DATA AND COORDINATION

The conferees note and commend the experience and accomplishments of the State Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies in the area of job training and job placement. These experiences would lend valuable assistance to the ongoing activities in the States and localities under the Job Training Partnership Act.

Therefore, the conferees wish to make clear their intent that full coordination be encouraged between the activities of the State Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies, authorized under title I of the Rehabilitation Act, as amended, and the State and local efforts authorized under the Job Training Partnership Act.

This coordination could lead to the valuable sharing of expertise, experience and efforts in the area of job training and placement, and could be of great benefit to persons with mental and physical disabilities served by both the State rehabilitation programs, and the Job Training Partnership Act.

It is the intent of the conferees that data gathered under section 618(b)(3) of Public Law 98-199, the Education of the Handicapped Act Amendments of 1983, be utilized by State Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies in meeting State plan requirements, particularly the requirements of clauses (10) and (15) under section 101 of the Rehabilitation Act.

Section 618(b)(3) of Public Law 98-199 requires that State Special Education Agencies collect data on: "the number of handicapped children and youth exiting the educational system each year through program completion or otherwise, by disability category and age, and anticipated services for the next year;".

Section 101, clauses (10) and (15) of the Rehabilitation Act outline requirements for the assessment of statewide needs of handicapped individuals.

It is the intent of the conferees that this information about handicapped special education students served through the State Education Agencies be used to assist State Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies in determining the areas of service need for handicapped persons within their States. The conferees expect that this transfer of information will benefit handicapped persons in the transition from school to adult life. Sharing of this information with State Planning Councils authorized under the Developmental Disabilities Act would facilitate comprehensive statewide planning for adult services for handicapped persons.

LENGTH OF REAUTHORIZATION OF STATE GRANTS

The Senate bill reauthorizes the State grant entitlement program for three fiscal years.

The House amendment reauthorizes the State grant entitlement program for five fiscal years.

The House recedes with an amendment to provide that unless Congress has by the end of fiscal year 1986 exter.ded the authorization of appropriations for this section, or taken action to provide that the provisions of this section are no longer applicable, the authorization of appropriations for the State grant entitlement is extended for one additional year at a level of increase represented in any cost of living increase, based on the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers, for the previous fiscal year.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR STATE GRANTS

The Senate bill authorizes appropriations for the entitlement for State grants of $993.9 million for fiscal year 1984, $1,047.6 million for fiscal year 1985, and $1,103 million for fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment authorizes the entitlement for State grants at $1,037.8 million for fiscal year 1984, and for fiscal years 1985 through 1988 at the level of the entitlement for the previous fiscal year increased by the percentage that the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers increases for each such previous fiscal year. The House amendment further authorizes such additional sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988.

The Senate recedes with an amendment which provides that the total of amounts appropriated for the State grant entitlement program and the additional authorization of appropriations shall not exceed $1,117,500,000 for fiscal year 1985 and $1,203,200,000 for fiscal year 1986.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS IN EXCESS OF ENTITLEMENT

The House amendment provides that in any year in which amounts are appropriated in addition to the allotments to which States are entitled, such additional amounts shall be allocated in the same ratio to the amount so appropriated as each State's entitlement allotment bears to the sum of the allotments of all of the States.

The Senate bill does not contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

GRANTS TO INDIAN TRIBES

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment extend the authorization of appropriations for grants to Indian tribes at such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1986. The conference agreement includes this provision.

The conferees note that the evaluation required by section 131 of the act has never been submitted to Congress. This evaluation should have been submitted to Congress no later than 30 months after the date of enactment (November 6, 1978) of the Rehabilitation, Comprehensive Services, and Developmental Disabilities Amendments. The conferees expect the Secretary to conduct and complete expeditiously this evaluation of programs authorized by part D, American Indian Vocational Rehabilitation Services. In addition, the conferees expect the evaluation to include a comparison of the provision of vocational rehabilitation services to American Indians under part D to the provision of vocational rehabilitation services under section 101 to handicapped American Indians residing on large reservations, reservations in remote areas, and reservations spanning more than one State.

MAINTENANCE OF EFFORT

The Senate bill repeals, as of October 1, 1986, the provision of current law which authorizes supplementary Federal funding for States required to overmatch their Federal allotment for vocational rehabilitation services due to the maintenance of effort provision in section 111 of the Act.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

ELIGIBILITY FOR SERVICE

The House amendment deletes the words "beyond any reasonable doubt" from the provision of current law which requires that a finding of ineligibility for services must demonstrate beyond any reasonable doubt that the individual is not capable of achieving a vocational goal.

The Senate bill does not contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

CLIENT ASSISTANCE

The Senate bill requires the establishment of a client assistance program (CAP) in each State by September 30, 1985, as a condition of eligibility for the State grant for vocational rehabilitation services. The bill changes current law to require that the Governor shall designate a public or private agency to administer the program and that such agency shall be independent of the State Vocational Rehabilitation Agency or any agency providing treatment, services or rehabilitation under this Act. The bill authorizes appropriations of $6 million in fiscal year 1984, $6.3 million in fiscal year 1985, and $6.7 million in fiscal year 1986. Funds are to be allotted to States on the basis of relative State population, except that each State shall receive a minimum of $50,000 and each territory shall receive $30,000.

The House amendment reauthorizes appropriations for client assistance projects under current law at no less than $3.5 million of amounts appropriated in excess of $11,860,000 under section 310 of the Act for fiscal years 1984, 1985, and 1986. In the event that funds appropriated under section 310 do not exceed $11,860,000, the Commissioner is authorized to utilize such funds to carry out this section.

The House recedes with an amendment to change the effective date from September 30, 1985 to October 1, 1984 and to provide that in States in which section 112 client assistance program grants are now or have been administered in or by the Vocational Rehabilitation Agency, or an agency receiving vocational rehabilitation funds, the independence requirements do not pertain. The House amendment further requires that the Commissioner of the Rehabilitation Services Administration shall conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the client assistance program and provide the results to Congress no later than February 1, 1986. The House amendment further states the CAPs are prohibited from bringing any class actions.

Through this reauthorization, section 112, which authorized client assistance projects, is changed from a demonstration, discretionary program to a formula State grant program. The conferees concur that such a change is warranted so that handicapped individuals throughout the country may benefit from the services provided by client assistance programs. In authorizing this new State grant program new provisions are established to enhance and strengthen the original purposes of the client assistance program.

The conferees intend that the Governor have the widest range of advice prior to making the placement decision related to the client assistance program. The conferees believe that obtaining input from the Director of the State Vocational Rehabilitation Agency and the Director of the Developmental Disabilities Protection and Advocacy Program, as well as professional and consumer groups prior to the placement decision will assist the Governor in choosing the most appropriate option.

The conferees recognize that CAP projects have been placed in a variety of settings in the past. In order to ensure minimal disruption of such projects, while still ensuring the maximum level of their autonomy, the conferees intend that CAP projects formerly or currently administered and housed in a Vocational Rehabilitation Agency, may be administered and housed in such an agency if the Governor chooses such an option. In States which have never had a section 112 grant administered within such an agency, the Governor must not choose a Vocational Rehabilitation Agency to administer the program. However, nothing in this section shall be interpreted to prohibit the physical location of the Office of Client Assistance in a Vocational Rehabilitation Agency. Nothing in this section would prohibit the placement of a client assistance program with a Developmental Disabilities Council or a Protection and Advocacy Office.

The confereees believe that CAPs, to the maximum extent possible, encourage and assist handicapped individuals and Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies to resolve their differences through mediation before pursuing administrative and legal remedies.

The conferees believe that a thorough and thoughtful study of the new client assistance program formula grant program is needed to document the variety of approaches to client assistance services and their similarities and differences. The conferees realize that section 112(f) mandates that an annual report be submitted to the Secretary and Congress on the operation of the program during the previous year. However, the conferees intend that section 112(h) be a one-time extensive evaluation study as provided by section 14. It is the intent of the conferees that the annual report, required by section 112(f), continue to be submitted.

INNOVATION AND EXPANSION

The Senate bill amends existing law to delete reference to handicapped individuals who are poor and for whom the State Rehabilitation Agency shares responsibility for their treatment, education, and rehabilitation with other agencies. The Senate bill adds to current law reference to programs which maximize the use of technological innovations in meeting the employment training needs of handicapped youth and adults. Both the Senate bill and the House amendment extend the authorization of appropriations for innovation and expansion grants at such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment extends from September 30, 1982 until September 30, 1986 the date until which funds appropriated for grants under this section shall remain available.

The conference agreement includes both provisions.

RESEARCH

EXPENSES OF NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HANDICAPPED RESEARCH

The House amendment extends through fiscal year 1986 the authorization of such sums as may be necessary for the expenses of administering the National Institute of Handicapped Research.

The Senate bill does not contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR RESEARCH

The Senate bill authorizes appropriations for rehabilitation research of $36 million for fiscal year 1984, $38 million for fiscal year 1985 and $40 million for fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment authorizes such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1986 for rehabilitation research.

The House recedes with an amendment setting the authorization of appropriations at $36 million for fiscal year 1984, $40 million for fiscal year 1985 and $44 million for fiscal year 1986.

REQUIREMENTS OF THE DIRECTOR

The Senate bill specifies that the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research shall be an individual with substantial experience in rehabilitation and in research administration. The bill also requires the Director to establish a program of pediatric rehabilitation research through a grant to an institution of higher education and to establish, either directly or by way of grant or contract, a research and training center in the Pacific Basin.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

Historically the need for a research and training center for the handicapped in the Pacific Basin has been overlooked. Given the scarcity of resources for the rehabilitation of the handicapped in this area, the conferees feel that a research and training center should be established, drawing on the existing facilities and resources of the Rehabilitation Hospital in Hawaii, in order that the unique needs of the handicapped population in Hawaii, Guam and the Trust Territories be met.

GRANTS TO RESEARCH AND TRAINING CENTERS

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment provide that research and training centers shall include both comprehensive centers dealing with multiple disabilities and centers focused on particular disabilities. Grants to centers need not be automatically terminated at the end of a project period and may be renewed on the basis of a thorough evaluation and peer review, including site visits. Training of students preparing to be rehabilitation personnel through centers shall be an important priority.

The conference agreement includes these provisions.

GRANTS FOR FACULTY SUPPORT

The Senate bill provides that grants to research and training centers may include faculty support for teaching of rehabilitation related courses of study for credit and other courses offered by the institutions of higher education affiliated with the center.

The House amendment is identical except that it does not restrict courses to those that are rehabilitation related.

The house recedes.

The conferees intend that such grants for faculty support shall be for the teaching of rehabilitation related courses only, whether such courses are for credit or not for credit.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENT

The Senate bill makes a technical correction to section 204(b)(3) of the Act by striking out "pursuant to section 303(b)" and inserting in lieu thereof "pursuant to sections 310 and 311(b)".

The House amendment strikes out "303(b)" and inserts in lieu thereof "311".

The House recedes with an amendment inserting in lieu thereof "pursuant to sections 310 and 311".

GRANTS FOR INNOVATIVE RESEARCH

The Senate bill authorizes the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research to make grants to conduct a rehabilitation research program to test new concepts and innovative ideas, demonstrate research results of higher potential benefits, purchase prototype aids and devices for evaluation, develop unique rehabilitation training curricula, and be responsible to special initiatives of the Director. No single payment is to exceed $50,000 and the total amount available in any fiscal year for these special grants is not to exceed five percent of the total research funds available under section 204. Regulations and administrative procedures with respect to financial assistance under this paragraph shall, to the maximum extent possible, be expedited.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The house recedes with an amendment striking the word "payment" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "grants".

SUPPLEMENTARY SERVICES AND FACILITIES

GRANTS FOR CONSTRUCTION

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment extend the authorization of appropriations of such sums as may be necessary for the purpose of making grants and contracts for construction, staffing and planning assistance for rehabilitation facilities through fiscal year 1986. Amounts appropriated for construction or staffing grants under this section shall remain available for expenditure prior to October 1, 1987.

The conference agreement includes these provisions.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment extend the authorization of such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1986 for grants to States and public or nonprofit organizations and agencies for providing vocational training services to handicapped individuals, especially those with the most severe handicaps, in public or nonprofit rehabilitation facilities.

The conference agreement includes this provision.

PERSONNEL TRAINING

The Senate bill provides that trained rehabilitation personnel are to include individuals specifically trained to deliver services to persons who may benefit from independent living services and individuals specifically trained to deliver services in client assistance programs. Training provided to rehabilitation counselors is to include training in the applicability of the provisions of section 504.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

In amending section 304(a) of the Act the conferees agree that rehabilitation counselors receive training in the applicability of section 504. It is the intent of the conferees that such training enable counselors to inform their clients on section 504 protections as they relate to programs under this Act. While such training should also touch on the general applicability of section 504 to other Federal programs, it is not the conferees' intent to require extensive training in section 504 applicability other than in its relation to programs under this Act.

TARGETING OF TRAINING PROJECTS

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment strike from section 304(b) of the Act the provision relating to the utilization of grants or contracts for a balanced program to meet the medical, vocational and other personnel training needs of public and private rehabilitation programs and institutions. Both the Senate bill and the House amendment provide in lieu thereof the requirement that grants and contracts shall be targeted to areas of personnel shortage.

The conference agreement includes this provision.

It is the intent of the conferees that the term "personnel shortage" as used in section 304(b) and 304(c) apply not only to shortages in numbers of personnel, but also to deficiencies in levels of personnel skills. The conferees recognize that it is essential to maintain and upgrade the skills of presently employed personnel, as well as to increase the number of personnel in shortage areas, in order to meet current and projected vocational rehabilitation service needs.

For the purpose of ensuring high quality peer review of training grants, the conferees expect the Department of Education to allocate sufficient fund from within the salaries and expenses account of its budget. The conferees believe that competency, independence of judgement and adequate time to review all materials are vital, and expect such standards to be established and maintained.

The conferees wish to clarify that the phrase "other fields contributing to the rehabilitation of handicapped individuals" in section 304(b) includes the field of rehabilitation dentistry.

ALLOCATION OF TRAINING FUNDS

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment add to section 304(c) of the Act the requirement that the Commissioner submit to Congress, along with the budget submission for the succeeding fiscal year, a report which justifies in detail how the training funds for the previous year have been allocated by professional discipline and other program areas. The report shall contain findings on personnel shortages, how funds will be allocated in the succeeding year and how the findings of personnel shortages justify such allocations.

The conference agreement includes these provisions.

It is the intent of the conferees that the Commissioner shall be responsible for gathering accurate information for the report required by this section, and shall not depend solely on information which may be collected from organizations representing professional disciplines.

QUALIFIED PERSONNEL

The Senate bill inserts the word "qualified" before "personnel" each time it appears in section 304(a) of current law.

The House amendment inserts the word "qualified" before "personnel" where it first appears in sections 304(a) and (c).

The Senate recedes.

The conferees emphasize that the term "qualified personnel" as used in these sections refers to staff having met exising certification and/or licensure requirements of appropriate State and/or national certification boards, and is not intended to require licensure and/or certification where it is not presently required.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR TRAINING

The Senate bill authorizes for training $22 million for fiscal year 1984, $26.9 million for fiscal year 1985, and $28.3 million for fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment authorizes such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1984 through 1986.

The House recedes with an amendment setting the authorization of appropriations for training at $22 million for fiscal year 1984, $27 million for fiscal year 1985, and $31 million for fiscal year 1986.

COMPREHENSIVE REHABILITAITON CENTERS

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment extend through fiscal year 1986 the authorization of appropriations of such sums as may be necessary for comprehensive rehabilitation centers under section 305 of the Act.

The conference agreement includes this provision.

AUTHORIZAITON OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR SPECIAL PROJECTS

The Senate bill authorizes for appropriations for special projects, other than the Helen Keller National Center and special recreation projects, $12.9 million for fiscal year 1984, $13.6 million for fiscal year 1985, and $14.3 million for fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment authorizes for appropriations for special projects such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1984 through 1986. The House amendment deletes the reference to funding for the Helen Keller National Center.

The House recedes. In a subsequent amendment, the Senate recedes on deleting the reference to the Helen Keller National Center.

SPINAL CORD INJURY PROJECTS

The Senate bill strikes reference to spinal cord injuries from section 311(a)(1) of the Act, which authorizes the Commissioner to establish special projects for severely handicapped persons who can benefit from comprehensive services. The Senate bill authorizes the Director of the National Institute of Handicapped Research to make grants to pay all or part of the cost of special projects and demonstrations for spinal cord injuries, and requires the Director to coordinate such grants with the Commissioner.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

MENTAL RETARDATION GRANTS

The Senate bill authorizes the Commissioner to make special project grants to assist individuals with mental retardation to enter the labor force. Grants are to include training, work site modification, use of new technology, coordination with business and industry, and follow-up services for persons placed in employment.

The House amendment contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

The conferees are aware of the critical unmet vocational needs of mentally retarded persons. In order to begin to meet there needs, the conferees intend that the Commissioner target some funds authorized for projects under section 311 to projects for mentally retarded persons. These projects should include job search assistance; on-the-job training; job development including work site modification and use of advanced learning technology for skills training; dissemination of information on program activities to business and industry; and follow-up services for individuals placed in employment.

JOB TRAINING FOR HANDICAPPED YOUTH

The Senate bill authorizes the Commissioner to make grants for special projects and demonstrations, including research and evaluation, to provide job training for handicapped youths. Projects shall be designed to demonstrate cooperative efforts among local educational agencies, business and industry, vocational rehabilitation programs, organizations representing labor and local economic development programs. Projects are required to be coordinated with other projects assisted under section 626 of the Education of the Handicapped Act.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

SPECIAL RECREATION GRANTS

The Senate bill authorizes appropriations for special recreation grants under section 316 of the Act at $2.0 million for fiscal year 1984, $2.1 million for fiscal year 1985, and $2.2 million for fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

NATIONAL COUNCIL ON THE HANDICAPPED

ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT COUNCIL

The Senate bill removes the National Council from within the Department of Education and places it "within the executive branch" of the Federal Government.

The House amendment also removes the Council from within the Department of Education, but places it "within the Federal Government".

The Senate recedes with an amendment providing that the Council may accept voluntary and uncompensated services, notwithstanding the provisions of section 1342 of title 31, USC; accept, employ and dispose of any money or property, real or personal, or mixed, tangible or nontangible, received by gift, devise, bequest or otherwise; enter into contracts and cooperative agreements with government agencies, private firms, institutions and individuals for the conduct of research, preparation of reports and other activities; use not more than 10 percent of its available funds for official representation and reception; and that there be transferred from the amount available to the Office of Special Education and Rehabilitation Services, $500,000 in fiscal year 1984 to be available to the Council.

TRANSFER OF SECRETARY'S RESPONSIBILITIES

The House amendment provides that on the effective date of these amendments, the National Council on the Handicapped would be an independent agency within the Federal Government and would not be an agency within any department or agency of the United States. All responsibilities relating to the Council which are vested in the Secretary of Education would be transferred to the Chairman of the Council.

The Senate bill does not contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

RECIPIENTS OF COUNCIL ADVICE

The Senate bill deletes from those to whom the Council provides advice on the development of programs under this Act the Commissioner, the Secretary, and the appropriate Assistant Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and inserts in lieu thereof the President and the Congress.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes with an amendment retaining the Commissioner and changing "the appropriate Assistant Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare" to "the appropriate Assistant Secretary of the Department of Education".

The conferees recommend that the annual report of the National Council be compiled on a fiscal year basis.

COUNCIL EMPLOYEES AND EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

The Senate bill provides that the National Council may appoint an Executive Director, who shall be appointed from among individuals who are experienced in the planning or operation of programs for handicapped individuals. The Executive Director, rather than the Council as in present law, is authorized to hire up to seven technical and professional employees to assist the Council to carry out its duties.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

STUDY OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO HANDICAPPED INDIVIDUALS

The House amendment establishes separate authority for a National Commission on Federal Assistance to Disabled Americans to examine Federal legislation which affects disabled persons, identify barriers to integration and independence, and provide Congress and the President with specific recommendations on statutory revisions to improve current legislation. The Commission would be required to submit an interim report within 12 months of its first meeting and to submit a final report of its recommendations no later than 18 months after its first meeting. The Commission would be composed of 16 members appointed to represent the major executive departments and Congressional committees which administer and oversee Federal programs for handicapped individuals.

The Senate bill does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes with an amendment requiring the National Council on the Handicapped to carry out an examination of legislation affecting handicapped persons and to submit a report to the President and the Congress recommending legislative proposals no later than February 1, 1986.

The conferees recognize that there are a multitude of Federal programs that benefit Americans with disabilities. These programs are authorized through the Social Security Act, the Developmental Disabilities and Bill of Rights Act, the Rehabilitation Act, as well as legislation pertaining to education, housing, transportation, and food acquisition assistance. These various programs have eligibility criteria and other requirements that may not always complement opportunities and services available through other programs. Moreover, social, economic, and technological changes in the past several years have altered the level of need for specific services, the amount of service available, and the system by which such services are delivered.

The conferees direct the National Council on the Handicapped to assess Federally-funded programs for persons with handicaps to identify in Federal legislation unwarranted and/or unintentional barriers to opportunities for such persons and to determine how such barriers may be removed. Examples of areas which should be explored include the relationship between: income maintenance programs and rehabilitation and jobs programs; institutional care programs and community-based programs such as independent living; and education programs and job training services.

The conferees intend that the Council shall make legislative proposals based on its analyses of current law. The conferees expect that the Council shall make legislative recommendations to Congress which will promote the full integration of persons with disabilities in the workplace, in the family, and in the community.

ARCHITECTURAL AND TRANSPORTATION BARRIERS COMPLIANCE BOARD

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate bill extends the authorization of the Board through fiscal year 1984.

The House amendment extends the authorization of the Board through fiscal year 1986.

The Senate recedes.

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR HANDICAPPED INDIVIDUALS

COMMUNITY SERVICE EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment extend the authorization of appropriations of such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1986 for the community service employment pilot program for handicapped individuals under title VI, part A of this Act.

The conference agreement includes this provision.

ELIGIBILITY TO ENTER AGREEMENTS

Both the Senate bill and the House amendment provide that designated State units are eligible to enter into projects with industry agreements.

The conference agreement includes this provision.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR PROJECTS WITH INDUSTRY

The Senate bill authorizes appropriations for projects with industry at $13 million for fiscal year 1984, $14.4 million for fiscal year 1985, and $15.2 million for fiscal year 1986. Both the Senate bill and the House amendment authorize such sums as may be necessary for business opportunities for handicapped individuals under section 622 of the Act.

The House amendment authorizes appropriations of such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1984 through 1986 for projects with industry.

The House recedes.

STANDARDS FOR PROJECTS WITH INDUSTRY

The Senate bill requires the Commissioner to develop and publish performance standards for projects with industry (PWI) by July 1, 1984. The standards must be approved by the National Council on the Handicapped. The provision requires continued funding of projects which meet performance standards as stringent as the standards established by the Commissioner and included in the project agreement. Projects receiving assistance on the date of enactment of this section shall continue to receive assistance until October 1, 1984, unless the Commissioner determines that there is substantial failure to comply with the agreement.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes with an amendment to require that PWI agreements include a description of an evaluation plan which at the end of each year of a funding cycle reflects at a minimum the numbers and types of handicapped individuals assisted, the types of assistance provided, the sources of funding, the percentage of resources committed to each type of assistance provided, the extent to which the employment status and earning power of handicapped individuals changed following assistance, the extent of capacity building activities, and comparison with prior year activities.

The House amendment further requires the Commissioner, not later than February 1, 1985, to develop and publish standards for evaluation consistent with the above to assist each recipient to evaluate the operation of its project. The Commissioner shall conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the PWI program and submit a report, including recommendations, to Congress on February 1, 1986. In developing standards for evaluation the Commissioner shall consider recommendations from State Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies, current PWI recipients, professional organizations representing industry and handicapped individuals, individuals assisted by the projects, and labor organizations.

The House amendment further requires that no such standards may be established unless approved by the National Council on the Handicapped. The Council shall have up to 90 days to approve such standards and may be deemed to have approved them if the Department of Education has not received notification of approval or disapproval from the Council within 90 days. Council decisions on standards shall occure at regularly scheduled meetings and shall be the result of a simple majority of those present.

Parties to present agreements under this section shall continue to receive assistance through September 30, 1986, unless the Commissioner determines that there is a substantial failure to comply with the agreement.

It is the intent of the conferees that the report due to Congress no later than February 1, 1986 shall be used in the development of reauthorization legislation which must be enacted by October 1, 1986. Therefore, it is imperative that the Commissioner honor this submission date for the report.

EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION

The Senate bill requires the Commissioner, to the extent practicable, to assure an equitable distribution of payments for projects with industry among the States.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

COMPREHENSIVE SERVICES FOR INDEPENDENT LIVING

STANDARDS FOR INDEPENDENT LIVING CENTERS

The Senate bill requires that performance standards for independent living centers funded under title VII, part B, be developed and published by July 1, 1984, and that the Commissioner make recommendations for the improvement and continuation of each center and for the support of new centers. The standards must have the approval of the National Council on the Handicapped. Each center receiving assistance at the time of the enactment of this provision shall continue to receive assistance until a final evaluation report is submitted, unless there has been a substantial failure to comply with the approved application.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes with an amendment to require that applications for grants under this section contain an evaluation plan which shall, at the end of each year of a funding cycle, reflect at least the following: numbers and types of individuals assisted; extent to which individuals with varying handicapping conditions were served; types of services provided; sources of funding; percentage of resources committed to each type of service provided; how services contributed to the maintenance of or increased independence of handicapped individuals; extent to which handicapped individuals participate in management and decision-making in the center; extent of capacity building activities, including collaboration with other agencies and organizations; extent of catalytic activities to promote community awareness, involvement and assistance; extent of outreach efforts and impact of such efforts; and a comparison, when appropriate, of prior year activities with most recent year activities.

The House amendment further provides that the Commissioner shall, not later than February 1, 1985, develop and publish standards for evaluation consistent with the above provisions to assist each center to review and evaluate its operation. The Commissioner shall conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the program and submit a report to Congress no later than February 1, 1986. The report shall include recommendations for the improvement and continuation of grantees and for the support of new centers. In conducting the evaluation, the Commissioner shall apply standards consistent with the standards required by this section. In developing standards to be used by the grantees and to be used in the comprehensive evaluation, the Commissioner shall obtain and consider recommendations from national organizations representing handicapped individuals and independent living programs, from independent living centers, from professionals serving handicapped individuals, and from individuals, associations and organizations engaged in research in independent living.

No standards may be established unless approved by the National Council on the Handicapped. The Council shall have up to 90 days to approve such standards and may be deemed to have approved them if the Department of Education has not received notification of approval or disapproval within the 90 days. Council decisions on standards shall occur at regularly scheduled meetings and shall be the result of a simple majority of those present.

Grantees receiving assistance upon the date of enactment shall continue to receive assistance through September 30, 1986, unless the Commissioner determines that there is a substantial failure to comply with the provisions of the approved application.

It is the intent of the conferees that the report due to Congress no later than February 1, 1986 shall be used in the development of reauthorization legislation which must be enacted by October 1, 1986. Therefore, it is imperative that the Commissioner honor this submission date for the report.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDEPENDENT LIVING SERVICES

The Senate bill authorizes appropriations of such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1986 for title VII, part A, comprehensive State services for independent living; and for part C, services for older blind individuals, and strikes the provision in current law that not in excess of 10% of the amount appropriated for part A shall be available to carry out the provisions of part C of this title. The bill authorizes appropriations of $21 million for each of the fiscal years 1984 through 1986 for part B, independent living centers.

The House amendment authorizes such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1986 for part A, comperhensive State services; part B, independent living centers; and part D, protection and advocacy. The House amendment retains the current law provision setting aside 10% of part A appropriations for part C.

The House recedes with an amendment providing such sums as may be necessary for part A, part C and part D, through fiscal year 1986, and setting the authorization of appropriations for part B at $21 million for fiscal year 1984, $22 million for fiscal year 1985, and $23 million for fiscal year 1986.

The conferees wish to strongly endorse the full implementation of the independent living concept through funding for part of title VII, which authorizes a statewide comprehensive service delivery system for the severely handicapped. Cooperatively with the centers funded through part B of this title, services made available through part A would enhance, expand and stabilize the independent living program. Although only five years old, independent living centers have demonstrated that there are cost-effective alternatives to institutional case for the severely handicapped and that persons with the most severe disabilities can improve their capacity to function in the employment market or in preparation for employment. Until a statewide delivery system is implemented, however, the benefits of independent living services will be available to only a small percentage of severely handicapped persons who are in need of them in order to lead full and productive lives. The conferees urge a sufficient appropriation for part A of title VII in fiscal year 1985 to permit a meaningful start-up of the statewide independent living program.

TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

The House amendment makes a technical correction, redesignating section 731 of part E of the Act as section 741, and strikes a reference to "Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973" and inserts in lieu thereof "Job Training Partnership Act".

The Senate bill does not contain a comparable provision.

The Senate recedes.

HELEN KELLER NATIONAL CENTER

The Senate bill authorizes appropriations for the Helen Keller National Center, as it is presently administered under section 313 of the Act, at $3.7 million for fiscal year 1984, $3.9 million for fiscal year 1985, and $4.1 million for fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment removes the authority for the Helen Keller National Center from the Rehabilitation Act by repealing section 313 and establishes a separate authorization for the Center under a Helen Keller National Center Act. The Center would continue to be administered by the Secretary of Education. The House amendment authorizes such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1984 and for each of the four subsequent fiscal years as appropriations for the Helen Keller National Center for Deaf-Blind Youths and Adults.

The Senate recedes with an amendment setting the authorization of appropriations for the Center at $4.0 million for fiscal year 1984, $4.2 million for fiscal year 1985, and $4.3 million for fiscal year 1986.

The House amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The House recedes.

SPECIAL IMPACT AID FOR IMMIGRANT CHILDREN EDUCATION

Funds are distributed on the basis of numbers of immigrant children in qualifying districts, with a maximum payment of $500 per student. Any Federal funds received by a school district for any such children due to their status would be deducted from the school district's grant under this program.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TRIBUTE TO LINDEN BURZELL

HON. PETE WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in honor of his retirement, I would like to take this occasion to pay tribute to Linden Burzell.

As a prominent member of the San Diego County community, Linden Burzell has enjoyed a most distinguished career with the San Diego County Water Authority. He officially retired on December 30, 1983, after achieving the position of general manager and chief engineer. This high position demonstrates the leadership and talent Linden gave both to his career and to his community. He has achieved remarkable success on behalf of the water authority and will be long remembered for the realization of the water authority's solid financial position.

He retires with honor and the gratitude of a community which he so long and ably served.●

A SALUTE TO AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL AND THE INEXTINGUISHABLE CAUSE OF HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article by Anthony Lewis that appeared in the New York Times while we were in recess. In the article, Mr. Lewis explains why the cause of human rights is so powerful, and why the Reagan administration has been unsuccessful in removing human rights as a factor in American foreign policy. He also pays tribute to Amnesty International, "the best source of information on what individuals suffer at official hands," for its work on human rights. I have valued Amnesty International's many contributions to the work of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, which I have the honor to chair, and I am pleased to share this salute to Amnesty International and the cause of human rights with my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Dec. 12, 1983]

THE FLAME BURNS

(By Anthony Lewis)

BOSTON, Dec. 11—It was an extraordinary piece of unintended symbolism: the Soviet Union paying tribute to the power of human rights as an idea. That was the result of a curious event in Moscow last week.

Officials called a press conference to mark United Nations Human Rights Day. It turned into an attack on Andrei Sakharov, the great Soviet physicist whose advocacy of human rights led to his exile in Gorky. Sakharov was "cuckoo," an official said, tapping his head; Sakharov asked the United States to carry out a nuclear attack on the U.S.S.R.

So here is a frail worn man, isolated in a closed Russian city, hounded by secret policemen, and he still worries the state—worries it enough to call for preposterous official slander. What better testament could there be to the power of a single individual, holding fast to the human ideal against all the crushing apparatus of the modern state?

As with Sakharov, so with the standing of human rights in the world generally. Scorned and traduced, the idea survives. Indeed, it seems to take a deeper hold on the minds of men and women as they suffer new tyranny. The paradox is one relieving phenomenon in a harsh age, a time when people everywhere are discouraged and fearful.

Look to almost any corner of the earth today, and you see governments engaging in political detention, torture and murder. Orwell's vision of physical cruelty as the instrument of authority has become almost commonplace.

Amnesty international is the best source of information on what individuals suffer at official hands. It is dispassionate in its rejection of inhumanity, and the universality of its approach makes the essential point that human beings everywhere are entitled to integrity of body and spirit. Wherever those rights are violated, by officials of whatever ideology, we who are free should be protesting.

The detailed reports put out by Amnesty makes horrifying reading. A recent one on Syria described the beating and electrical torture of prisoners and the cold-blooded killing of more than 1,000 by their guards.

Of course no one country has a monopoly on horror. Murder is the technique of political intimidation used by right-wing governments in El Salvador and Guatemals. Revolutionary Iran kills people simply because they practice the Bahai faith. The Turkish military has imprisoned and tortured those who favor democracy.

The Soviet Union has invented new "crimes" and speeded up the confinement of dissidents in psychiatric wards and labor camps. Indonesia continues to brutalize East Timor. South Africa maintains its racial system by intensified repression, operating sometimes now through the facade of a Ciskei, a murderous nightmare set up as a so-called independent state.

And yet, and yet. . . . There is some reason for hope. The worst that Orwell foresaw was the expunging of the very idea of human decency; he showed us a future in which the people as a whole knew nothing of love or kindness or truth. And that has not happened. To the contrasting public concern for human rights has intensified and become a significant political reality.

Consider what has happened in the United States. President Reagan set out to eliminate human rights as an effective factor in American foreign policy. He would use the issue against Communist governments but would not penalize others no matter how murderous. And so he cuddled up to mass murderers in Guatemala; his one-time Secretary of State mocked the churchwomen killed in El Salvador; his Ambassador to the United Nations courted the generals who spread death in Argentina.

But for all of Ronald Reagan's popularity, that policy was unacceptable to Americans. They could not understand why torture should be forgiven if done by a "friendly government." And so the Reagan Administration has had to reverse at least the appearance of its policy, criticizing the Salvador death squads even while acting to continue military aid despite them.

Support for human rights has turned out to matter in our foreign relations, too. The dramatic example is Argentina, whose new civilian president, Raul Alfonsin, was a leading civil rights campaigner. He has said that thousands of Argentinians lived because of the Carter Administration's pressure against the killers in the military regime. He and other democrats in Latin America want U.S. leadership for human rights.

To be effective, the concerned must be indivisible. Amnesty is making that point now in pressing what it calls a Universal Appeal for Amnesty for All Prisoners of Conscience. People in 120 countries have signed petitions to that end. The first to sign, secretly and a remote place, was the man who suggested the idea: Andrei Sakharov.●

MILITARY WIVES

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, columnist Erma Bombeck recently called attention to the contributions made to our Nation by military wives. The wives of our Armed Forces personnel have difficult jobs, yet they give unselfishly to help their husbands in the important roles they play in maintaining our national security. I am pleased to bring this article to the attention of Members of Congress.

ERMA

(By Erma Bombeck)

Early last year I wrote a column on military wives saying they had never been honored for their contribution to understanding throughout the world and personal sacrifice to this country they represent.

Last September, Margaret Hudson of Columbus, Miss., made history. She became the first wife to be so honored. When her husband, Col. James D. Hudson, retired from the Department of the Air Force, Margaret was given a special certificate of appreciation.

The tribute was three lines long. It said she had earned "grateful appreciation for her own unselfish, faithful, and devoted service. Her unfailing support and understanding helped to make possible her husband's lasting contribution to the Nation."

There were a lot of memories between those three lines.

Support. A husband who flew 30 missions to Germany in WW II, participating in the Korean War and the Berlin Airlift.

Unselfishness. An if-not-single-then-unescorted parent who attended family birthdays, Christmases and graduations alone.

Understanding. Never knowing where her husband was assigned or when (and if) he'd be back. And the hard part: staying overseas when he returned to the States and not being allowed to go with him.

Contribution. In Bolivia on diplomatic duty where she was assaulted, becoming the first woman assigned overseas to be injured. A revolution where their home was invaded by 36 soldiers with machine guns.

Appreciation. Two tours of Vietnam.

Margaret Hudson would be the first to say she is not unique in the annals of wives whose job it is to follow and wait.

Military wives, as well as others whose husbands follow orders, have been doing it for years since some warrior picked up the first rock.

The point is, every 15 seconds in this country an award is given for something. (If you're counting country-Western performers, make that every two seconds.)

Awards made you feel good every time you dust them.

They don't cost a lot, but every time you look at them, you remember how great you felt when you received them.

Margaret accepted her award before a group of 50 people. There were no news media there. Coffee and doughnuts were served.

Forgive me, Margaret, but I had to share this with 31 million readers. They're applauding. I hope you can hear it.●

LAKE WORTH POLICE SERGEANT STROHACKER HONORED AS LAW OFFICER OF THE YEAR

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, the outstanding service of Lake Worth Police Sgt. Roy Dean Strohacker has earned him the gratitude and respect of the citizens of Palm Beach County, Fla. I share their pride and submit for the RECORD two articles published in the Palm Beach Post on December 10, 1983, on the occasion of Sergeant Strohacker's receipt of the Distinguished Law Officer of the Year Award.

[From the Palm Beach Post, Dec. 10, 1983]

LW SERGEANT OFFICER OF YEAR IN PB COUNTY

(By Tony Wharton)

Lake Worth Police Sgt. Roy Dean Strohacker received the Distinguished Law Officer of the Year award for Palm Beach County last night from The Post and the Evening Times, marking the second year in a row a Lake Worth officer has been selected.

When he heard his name announced, Strohacker rocked back in his chair, then turned and kissed his wife Caroline.

"Not enough credit is given to law officers in this county. That this was done is a marvelous thing," Strohacker told a crowd of nearly 200 in the Hyatt Palm Beaches. "I'm greatly honored, but I share this award with all of these gentlemen and with my wife."

The 1982 award was given to Lake Worth Police Sgt. Alfred Steinmetz. The first award in 1981 went to West Palm Beach patrolman Jeffrey Baker.

Lake Worth Police Chief Lee Reese said "Two years in a row certainly pleases me. Roy deserved it as much as Sgt. Steinmetz. He's a fine person and officer."

Post Editor Tom Kelly and Evening Times Editor Jack Foster gave Strohacker an original metal sculpture designed for the award as well as a check for $1,000.

In his 14 years with the Lake Worth Police Department, Strohacker has served in every division. He is currently an undercover vice officer and is a polygraph operator.

Strohacker specializes in intelligence on motorcycle gangs and has been cited for his work in the field by the Florida Intelligence Unit.

Last year Strohacker prevented the rape of a young girl by a suspect with a history of rape and murder. He directed a Rape Task Force in Lake Worth this year which cleared up five rapes with the arrest of two people.

A second-degree black belt in karate, Strohacker gives free karate clinics and lectures on self-defense.

He got into police work while he was a karate instructor and has never regretted it.

He was educated in Ohio public schools, at Palm Beach Junior College and Florida Atlantic University. He also has taken numerous professional training classes.

Strohacker married Caroline 13 years ago and has a 7-month-old son named Jerry.

Strohacker, who reads and translates Japanese, has a Japanese sword collection which is a familiar fixture at shows in local malls and auditoriums. He is also an amateur banjo player.

Strohacker was chosen from a field of 11 nominees. The others were Atlantis Cpl. Jack Allen and patrolman Jack Law, West Palm Beach patrolman Donald Black, Boca Raton Detective John Brady Jr., Belle Glade Detective Albert Dowdell III, Lake Park patrolman William Harrison Jr., Palm Beach patrolman Christopher Morris, sheriff's Detective Richard Oetinger, Bonton Beach patrolman David Nissensohn and Delray Beach Sgt. Frederick Zieglar.

AN OFFICER OF DISTINCTION

Sgt. Roy Dean Strohacker is both an outstanding police officer and an outstanding citizen. He is as diligent at preventing crimes as at solving them. The Post is proud to join with the Evening Times in honoring him as the 1983 Palm Beach County Distinguished Law Officer of the Year.

Strohacker has received numerous commendations during his 14 years with the Lake Worth Police Department. Three times he has received monthly awards: once for a lengthy rape investigation that resulted in an arrest, once for averting a sexual assault and once for cracking a burglary ring.

In 1973 he rescued the occupant of an auto stalled on the railroad tracks in front of an oncoming train. In 1975 he saved three persons from a burning house. He has participated with distinction in many drug busts, including one in which 6½ tons of marijuana and 70 pounds of Quaaludes were seized.

In his off-duty hours he advises a Rainbow Girls youth group, plays with the Gold Coast Banjo Club, collects Japanese swords and teaches karate. He belongs to the Fraternal Order of Police, Police Benevolent Association, Masonic Lodge, Scottish Rite Lodge, Amara Shrine, Eastern Star and Moose Club. He has been involved with the Florida Intelligence Unit and is a licensed polygraph operator. He reads and translates Japanese.

Roy Dean Strohacker has fullfilled with distinction the trust society has placed in him as a law officer. Well done.●

CULTURAL CONSERVATION STUDY RELEASED

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend to the attention of my colleagues a publication which has just appeared, entitled Cultural Conservation: The Protection of Cultural Heritage in the United States (Washington, Library of Congress, 1983). It is an attractively printed and well-illustrated volume. More important, it addresses in a comprehensive manner a range of issues of immediate relevance to historic preservation and related cultural efforts around the United States.

The request for this report came from the 96th Congress, and was included in the National Historic Preservation Act amendments of 1980 (Public Law 96-515). Section 502 of that act specifically directed that:

The Secretary (of the Department of the Interior) in cooperation with the American Folklife Center of the Library of Congress shall, within two years after the date of the enactment of this Act, submit a report to the President and the Congress on preserving and conserving the intangible elements of our cultural heritage such as arts, skills, folklife, and folkways. The report shall take into account the view of other public and private organizations, as appropriate. This report shall include recommendations for legislative and administrative actions by the Federal Government in order to preserve, conserve, and encourage the continuation of the diverse traditional prehistoric, historic, ethnic, and folk cultural traditions that underlie and are a living expression of our American heritage.

Requests from the Congress for such reports have not always led to satisfactory results. In this case, I am happy to observe that the National Park Service and the American Folklife Center at the Library of Congress have collaborated closely and effectively to draw together the final report and recommendations.

Further, they have consulted a wide variety of organizations and individuals around the country in an effort to provide a balanced perspective. Seven distinguished consultants from the field of anthropology, archeology, folklore, and folklife, and historic preservation met periodically to guide the development of the study: Steven F. Arvizu, California State University, Sacramento; James Deetz, Lowie Museum, University of California, Berkely; Henry Glassie, Unviersity of Pennsylvania; Archie Green, retired from the University of Texas, Austin; Ruthann Knudson, Woodward-Clyde Consultants, San Francisco; John Peterson, Mississippi State University; and Robert E. Stipe, Chapel Hill, NC.

Essentially the study strives to integrate efforts in historic preservation with a broader concept of "cultural conservation," including not only tangible elements for preservation such as historical buildings and archeological sites, but also the intangible cultural expressions representing the traditional culture of regional, ethnic, and occupational groups in the United States. Certainly there has been a growing understanding among people involved with historic preservation that there was an important relationship between the tangible and intangible elements of our culture, but I hope this study will help us be more effective in dealing with our cultural heritage in a better integrated fashion.

In that regard, I am pleased to note that the Secretary of the Interior, in a letter of June 1 to the President and the Congress, embraced a number of aspects of this report and instructed the National Park Service, in consultation with the American Folklife Center, to undertake a number of administrative actions to carry out the reports' recommendations.

The report cites public events as one of the ways to encourage the preservation of our rich folk culture. An excellent example of how the Federal Government and interested organizations are already working in this area is the National Folk Festival, which was held in the Cuyahoga Valley National Recreation Area, between Cleveland and Akron, last fall. The festival—this year's was the 45th annual festival—is sponsored by the National Council for the Traditional Arts, headed by Joe T. Wilson.

The weekend-long celebration, which drew over 25,000 visitors, included some of the best of the tamburitzan, polka, and bluegrass bands and gospel choirs found in Ohio, as well as an opportunity for some cultural cross-pollinization through the introduction of Cajun, Mexican, Chicago Blues, and other disparate musical forms. The festival was the product of two ideals: The preservation of our natural and scenic resources, through the efforts of the National Park Service, and the preservation of our cultural and folk heritage, which is the goal of the National Council for the Traditional Arts. The two combined their complementary ojectives to present this extraordinary event in a most appropriate setting—and are sponsoring similar annual events in other parks across the Nation.

Special mention should be made of several others who helped make the report possible, particularly Alan Jabbour, director of the American Folklife Center, and Peter Bartis, or the American Folklife Center; Russell Dickenson, Director of the National Park Service, and Jerry Rogers, Bennie Keel, and Larry Aten of the National Park Service: and Ormond H. Loomis, coordinator of the cultural conservation study and director of the Florida folklife program.

Following is the executive summary or the report, which provides further background on the issue, a general explanation of cultural conservation, and the major recommendations for further action that needs to be taken.

The summary follows:

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

BACKGROUND

In amending the National Historic Preservation Act of 1966, the 96th Congress realized that the existing Historic Preservation Program fails to provide clear coverage for the full range of cultural resources in the United States. Historic properties are the sole type of resource specified for protection and benefits. When not embodied in a structure or site, intangible elements of our cultural heritage fall outside the scope of this law.

The people of the United States treasure their distinctive roots and strive to perpetuate the richness of their cultural heritage in its intangible as well as tangible aspects. Productivity, freedom, and unity come from our cultural diversity. Over a century of policy and programs reflects the Federal commitment to cooperate with private initiatives toward the protection of cultural heritage. Yet the resulting assortment of efforts does not adequately protect the complete spectrum of cultural resources.

Extending appropriate protection and benefits to valuable cultural resources that have no tangible form is complicated. A variety of work relates, but provides no simple solutions. Cultural preservation and cultural encouragement, though mutually dependent, operate in distinct ways. Efforts as diverse as documentation and archiving, museum exhibits, festivals, books, and preservation plans can all contribute in positive ways.

The issue bears on a modest but significant investment of Federal energies. The national historic preservation program requires Federal agencies to assess and account for cultural resources in the development of their undertakings. The National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 acknowledges the importance of the human environment and traditional lifeways in evaluating the total environment. Apart from historic preservation and environmental policy, a number of Federal agencies affect the development of community life through work in folklife and related cultural programs.

The term "folklife" is useful in addressing the problem. Defined in the American Folklife Preservation Act of 1976 as "the traditional expressive culture shared within the various groups in the United States: familial, ethnic, occupational, religious, regional," folklife encompasses the areas of community life and values omitted by historic preservation. These areas involve the living heritage of a people. A closer coordination of work in folklife and historic preservation seems appropriate.

CULTURAL CONSERVATION

Cultural conservation is a concept for organizing the profusion of private and public efforts that deal with traditional community cultural life. It envisions cultural preservation and encouragement as two faces of the same coin. Preservation involves planning, documentation, and maintenance; and encouragement involves publication, public events, and educational programs.

In application, cultural conservation means a systematic, coordinated approach to the protection of cultural heritage. The national historic preservation program supports planning, documentation, and maintenance for properties. The Folk Arts Program of the National Endowment for the Arts supports presentations of traditional arts. Programs at the National Endowment for the Humanities support scholarly interpretation of subjects related to folklife. Thinking of these and other national efforts in terms of cultural conservation will give new perspectives in shaping policies and programs.

Of the strategies that make up cultural conservation, documentation stands out because it can give intangible elements of cultural heritage tangible form. Information which identifies and describes folklife can be archived for reference; used in the development of publications, public events, and educational programs; and considered in the decision-making for historic preservation planning. At this time, documentation is underutilized in the combined national effort toward cultural conservation.

Current developments suggest an important direction of state and local activities. State Historic Preservation Offices already do planning, documentation, and maintenance to preserve cultural properties. A growing assortment of ethnic culture, folk arts, oral history, and other community programs work to develop the kinds of publications, public events, and educational programs necessary to encourage cultural heritage. In effect, these programs constitute emergent folklife offices. Association between the two types of programs seems inevitable nationwide, and imminent in several states.

RECOMMENDATIONS

To enable the Federal government to cooperate in the directions shown by private, local and state initiatives the following steps are needed:

Include folklife and related traditional lifeways among the cultural resources recognized by the National Historic Preservation Act and the National Environmental Policy Act;

Make the Secretary of the Interior a member ex officio of the Board of Trustees of the American Folklife Center and the Librarian of Congress a member ex officio of the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation to increase the linkage and coordination of these key agencies;

Develop a standing memorandum of agreement between the National Park Service and the American Folklife Center to delineate and coordinate their efforts;

Establish an ongoing documentation program in the Department of the Interior and the Library of Congress to identify and preserve a record of folklife and other living elements of cultural heritage in the United States; and

Increase the recognition given to areas of traditional community life and values in the work of a number of agencies.

The report urges the President, the Congress, and the appropriate agencies to take action on all these points.●

TAX SIMPLIFICATION

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, in his state of the Union address, the President commissioned the Treasury Department to undertake a study on tax reform and simplification plans, a report on this study to be due in December 1984. Tax simplification is, of course, a goal that nearly all of us in the Congress share, and one which is sought as well by the great majority of our country's taxpayers. It is no closely guarded secret that the complexity of our tax structure, and the perception that all the various special exemptions and tax loopholes that have been put into the law over the years have made it a haven for the rich and a millstone for the low and middle income, have greatly decreased the voluntary compliance aspects of the Federal income tax. Further, these two factors have contributed greatly to the estimated $100 billion in due, but unpaid, taxes that disappear from the Treasury every year.

While I am sure we will all await with great expectation the results of this study, there are apparently already some indications of what shape the results may take. On January 9, 1984, John E. Chapoton, Treasury Department Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy, addressed the National Retail Merchants Association meeting in New York. Assistant Secretary Chapoton is the administration's chief expert on tax policy. I have obtained a copy of the outline of remarks made that day, and request permission to insert this document in the RECORD.

Of particular interest to Members, and the general public, are Mr. Chapoton's remarks relative to many of the tax simplification proposals currently being circulated. I was particularly surprised by his comment on the "flat tax" proposal, championed by many conservative organizations throughout the country. Of this proposal, the Assistant Secretary says, "A pure flat rate income tax—simplistic and attractive, but unrealistic because of the dramatic shift in the tax burden it would cause from upper- to lower- and middle-income taxpayers." Although this is a curious thing to say about a tax that is being ballyhooed as a tax relief measure for the low- and middle-income taxpayer, I share this assessment. A flat tax would, indeed, shift the tax burden greatly from those who can most afford it, the rich, right onto the backs of those who can least afford it, the low and middle income.

This comment by itself would make this outline of remarks worth reprinting, but there are other equally valuable insights into the administration's preferences for the Tax Code. On the matter of mortgage revenue bonds, which the administration prefers to call mortgage subsidy bonds (MSB), the Assistant Secretary has this to say: "The administration strongly opposed the extension of MSB as an unnecessary and inefficient subsidy to home buyers. . ." And on the matter of a proposal to impose State volume caps on the issuance of industrial revenue bonds, a matter of particular interest to my State of South Dakota, which uses such bonds extensively in its development efforts, he has this to say:

We strongly support such limitations. They are needed both to control the growth of private purpose tax-exempt financing, which is an unreviewed and rapidly growing form of indirect Federal spending, and to offset the substantial revenue loss from the extension of MSB.

All in all, this is an extremely interesting outline of remarks, and I would urge my colleagues to examine it closely for hints as to where the study commissioned by the President may well lead.

OUTLINE OF REMARKS—NATIONAL RETAIL MERCHANTS ASSOCIATION

(New York City, January 9, 1984)

I. INTRODUCTION

I am pleased to join the panel discussion this morning on the economic outlook for 1984 and beyond. I would like to comment on the prospects for changes to our Federal income tax laws in the Second Session of the 98th Congress, and then briefly suggest where tax policy might be headed over the next several years.

II. SHORT-TERM OUTLOOK

A. Congressional status

1983 was a surprising year; we saw no significant tax bill.

The House and Senate in 1983 approved a budget plan for fiscal year 1984 that called for higher taxes totalling $73 billion over the next 3 years, 1984-86.

Legislation reported out by the tax-writing Committees did not meet these totals. The Ways and Means Committee did report out a tax bill in October (H.R. 4170, the Tax Reform Act of 1983), but this legislation was not designed primarily to raise revenue even though it would have increased receipts by several billion dollars over the next three years. The rule under which the House was to debate this bill was defeated on the House floor—in part over its provisions limiting the future growth of private purpose tax-exempt bonds, and in part because the rule allowed unrelated Medicare amendments and amendments to increase revenues substantially. The result: no tax bill from the House.

The Senate Finance Committee sent a $13 billion tax package to the Budget Committee on October 31, but this bill was stymied when the House failed to pass its reconciliation bill. These matters will be pending business when Congress returns January 23. But they are not major factors in dealing with the deficit.

In the waning days of the First Session, the Senate Finance Committee began consideration of a large deficit reduction measure, which included such revenue items as an across-the-board tax on energy, a high-income individual surcharge, a tax on corporate economic income, and several Treasury-supported proposals dealing with tax shelter, accounting and corporate tax abuses. Prior to adjourning, the Committee instructed its staff to draft a bill along these lines, to raise $75 billion in revenue in 1984-87. Any tax increases would be contingent in some fashion on spending reductions of an equal amount—the formula would be $1 in taxes for $1 in spending cuts, for a total deficit reduction package of $150 billion over 1984-87. The Senate Finance Committee bill will be presented February 15; but for now that deficit reduction package will take a back seat until the Administration's budget is presented.

B. Administration position

The success of any efforts to raise revenue when Congress comes back hinges on the Administration's position on tax increases. The President has made no final decisions concerning what tax proposals, if any, he will present to the Congress with the FY 1985 Budget.

The President has clearly indicated his belief that any major tax increase before FY 1986 would be the wrong medicine for the economy. The recovery is well underway, and accelerating economic growth will contribute significantly toward reducing the deficit. There is abundant good news—retail sales have been very strong as you know, real growth continues at a very sustainable pace, unemployment is virtually spiraling down, and while interest rates are too high, they are at least reasonably steady.

By citing all of this good news, however, I don't mean to suggest that we should not worry about the deficits, which represent the one piece of significant bad news on the economic horizon. We do worry about the deficits—they are a matter of overriding concern. We hope the deficit problem diminishes with increased vigor in the economy, but we recognize that it will not disappear. Large deficits pose a real danger of seriously limiting the growth of our economy in future years; and over the short-term their impact on the Federal Reserve is unsettling. But we feel the culprit is spending—and we insist that Congress address the deficit problem by reducing spending before any increased revenues are considered.

The Administration has recognized that increased revenues may be necessary as insurance that future deficits remain within a tolerable range. Thus the President proposed a contingency tax plan as part of his Fiscal 1984 Budget.

The contingency tax plan was designed to raise revenue—consequently reducing the deficit—by about 1 percent of GNP. But, it would have gone into effect only if Congress adopted spending reductions proposed by the Administration, and if insufficient economic growth occurred to keep the deficits forcast for fiscal 1986 below 2½ percent of GNP.

The taxes proposed in this contingency plan were designed to have a broad, temporary impact on all taxpayers and all segments of the economy. More important, they would not have permanently affected the structural tax changes enacted by ERTA in 1981.

As I noted, no decision has been made as to whether we will include some type of contingency tax in the FY 1985 Budget. That is the number one budget issue now pending, and it will be resolved quite soon.

Whether or not our budget proposals contain a major revenue raising element however, the budget will contain realistic proposals for putting the deficit on a downward path over the next several years.

III. 1984 TAX BILL

Since Congress did not complete work on any tax bill before it adjourned, a number of needed tax changes separate and apart from the question of raising revenue were left open. These will have to be addressed early in 1984. Let me mention briefly the three most important:

A. Leasing by Nontaxable Entities: Both the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee agreed to provisions limiting the tax benefits to lessors with respect to property leased to State and local governments, private nonprofit organizations, and certain foreign persons.

Such action must be taken or the drain on the Treasury is almost unlimited—by selling city hall to a group of taxable investors and leasing it back to the city, who will continue to use it, or by leasing capital items owned by any tax-exempt group, a significant tax benefit can be obtained—it is in effect do-it-yourself revenue sharing.

The Administration strongly supports the effort contained in the bills adopted by the Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees to curtail this practice.

B. Life Insurance: The so-called TEFRA stop-gap provisions expired at the end of 1983.

The replacement of the existing system for taxing life insurance companies with the singly-phase system developed by Representatives Stark and Moore represents a significant improvement to the seriously flawed and outdated tax rules of current law.

The manner in which we tax life insurance companies and their products is extremely important because a tremendous amount of savings is achieved through insurance products.

C. Tax-exempt Bonds: The Ways and Means bill would have extended the mortgage subsidy bond program through 1988. It also permitted State and local governments to elect to exchange all or part of their MSB authority for authority to issue mortgage credit certificates. These entitle homeowners to nonrefundable income tax credits to offset home mortgage interest costs.

The Administration strongly opposed the extension of MSBs as an unnecessary and very inefficient subsidy to home buyers, but we have supported the more efficient mortgage credit certificate approach as an alternative if Congress extends MSBs over our objections.

The bill also would have imposed a number of additional limitations on tax-exempt IDBs and student loan bonds, including state volume caps, limits on small issue IDBs for land or existing facilities, denial of tax exemption where certain Federal guarantees are involved, and additional arbitrage restrictions.

We strongly support such limitations. They are needed both to control the growth of private purpose tax-exempt financing, which is an unreviewed and rapidly growing form of indirect Federal spending, and to offset the substantial revenue loss from the extension of MSBs.

These are the three most important hangover items—leasing to tax exempts, life insurance, and MSBs and IDBs. Action is urgently needed in these areas. In addition, several of the other items in the Ways and Means tax bill and some of those considered by the Finance Committee could be enacted as well. Thus, even if there is no major revenue initiative in 1984, there will in all likelihood be tax legislation.

IV. LONG-TERM CONSIDERATIONS

The smart money still has to be put on the proposition that Congress will not enact any major revenue initiative in 1984, and that it will not deal with the budget deficit in a meaningful way. If this is the case, discussions of revenue increases will continue into 1985. They will be expanded, however, to cover the structure of, as well as the amount of revenue raised by, the Federal tax system.

Some now suggest that the tax system has reached its political and economic limits. More people are questioning whether our present tax code is raising needed revenue efficiently, fairly, and without unduly burdening capital formation, saving and investment. These are the kinds of inquiries which raise the specter of fundamental tax reform.

Taxpayer dissatisfaction with the present system is no secret. Even with the dramatic reductions in marginal tax rates enacted in 1981, taxpayers remain convinced that their neighbors who are just as well off pay less tax than they do, and that taxpayers who are wealthier than they pay fewer taxes still.

As people talk increasingly of fundamental tax reform, we must look carefully at what is really involved. As is usually the case with a complex subject that people wish to be simple, a great deal more is involved than most people generally suspect.

The objectives of most tax reform plans are similar—reducing economic distortions caused by taxes, and improving equity and compliance, by broadening the tax base and lowering tax rates. However, various schemes have quite different effects on savings incentives, the uniformity of treatment among different activities, and the distribution of the tax burden.

A number of tax reform alternatives have been and will continue to be discussed. These include:

(1) A pure flat rate income tax—simplistic and attractive, but unrealistic because of the dramatic shift in the tax burden it would cause from upper to lower and middle income taxpayers.

(2) A modified flat-rate system—i.e., much less progressive, and much lower rates on a broader tax base. An example is the "fair tax" proposed by Senator Bradley and Representative Gephardt, which will evidently be the Democratic rallying point for tax reform. The thing to watch: the adverse impact Bradley-Gephardt would have on savings and investment by increasing the tax on savings.

(3) We have looked a good deal at a tax on consumed income; it would provide great simplicity to the taxation of business, and it would remove the bias against savings in the present system. But it would have its problems too. For example, while savings and repayment of debt would be fully deductable, borrowing would have to be added to the tax base. Transition problems also are troublesome.

(4) And of course we've heard a good deal lately about a national sales or value-added tax—a sales tax always rates high in the polls as the least unpopular tax. But it is hard to offset the significant regressivity which could result from such a tax, particularly among persons below the income tax level. Moreover, raising revenue in this fashion would cause the price level to raise in the short run, and we cannot overlook the negative reaction from states and localities.

In short, fundamental tax reform is no panacea, and it is certainly no answer to increased revenue needs in the short run.

In the long run, however, it could greatly increase the efficiency and fairness of our tax system, and much simplicity could be provided. Moreover, it is even possible that fundamental tax changes could, if forthright steps are taken, increase the yield of our tax system by reducing avoidance and evasion of taxes.

Tax simplification and reform will be much discussed in 1984 as in every Presidential election year. But this year could be different; it could be a serious and specific discussion.

Back to the immediate. Whether there is serious tax activity in 1984 to deal with the budget deficit depends on the Administration's budget which will be presented to the Congress in early February. And that I cannot disclose—final decisions are just now being made.●

H.R. 555, CWIP POLICY FACT SHEET

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, this week the House will consider H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983 introduced by my colleague from Iowa, Mr. HARKIN. This important piece of consumer legislation is strongly supported by Members who want to protect ratepayers from paying for powerplants they may never use, either because they will not live to see the plant put in service or because the plant may turn out to be unneeded and is abandoned, as so many have been in recent years.

H.R. 555 corrects the new FERC CWIP rule to protect consumers. As a result, it has attracted significant support both inside Congress and out. There are currently 110 House cosponsors and 22 diverse organizations backing the bill. These organizations include the American Paper Institute, American Association of Retired Persons, American Public Power Association, Citizen-Labor Energy Coalition, Consumer Energy Council of America, Consumer Federation of America, Consumers Union, Environmental Action, Environmental Defense Fund, Environmental Policy Institute, Friends of the Earth, National Association of State Utility Consumer Advocates, National Consumer League, National Council of Senior Citizens, National Farmers Union, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, Natural Resources Defense Council, Sierra Club, United Auto Workers, United Methodist Church, Board of Church and Society, and United Steelworkers of America.

I am including in my remarks a factsheet prepared by the staff of the Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power on H.R. 555 and a pamphlet distributed by the Fair Electric Rates Coalition answering commonly asked questions about CWIP. I hope Members will find the information helpful in their consideraton of this important consumer bill.

FACT SHEET ON H.R. 555

H.R. 555 would establish policies and procedures to guide the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) in its handling of applications by utilities to include CWIP in rate bases. CWIP refers to costs incurred by electric utilities in the construction of facilities such as powerplants while these facilities are being constructed and prior to their being placed in service to ratepayers. FERC regulates only wholesale sales, i.e., sales between two utilities for resale to ultimate customers. These sales represent about 10 percent of electricity sales nationally per annum.

Inclusion of CWIP in rate base causes problems:

It transfers a portion of the financial risk of constructing facilities from shareholder to ratepayer;

It encourages utilities to build long-lead time, expensive and risky large powerplants without examining whether they could meet their customers' needs by investing in less expensive conservation measures and other alternatives first;

It forces customers to pay for powerplants that many will see no benefits from, either because these powerplants will never be completed or because, as in the case of the elderly, they will not live to see the completion of facilities.

Nonetheless, inclusion of CWIP in rate base, where truly needed, can be an appropriate regulatory remedy, both in the interest of the utility and its ratepayers.

In 1983 the FERC changed long-standing policy and adopted a rule permitting virtually the automatic inclusion of 50 percent of CWIP in rate base. The careful review of individual CWIP requests necessitated by the problems that it can cause was abandoned.

H.R. 555, as reported by the Committee is a more moderate approach to CWIP than H.R. 555 as originally introduced. As reported, H.R. 555 would require the FERC to scrutinize CWIP requests on a case-by-case basis. It would limit CWIP in rate base to situations in which a utility shows that—

It has poor cash flow: specifically, cash flow must be less than 40 percent of construction expenditures;

It can only borrow money at rates significantly above the industry average;

The facility it wants to build is reasonably necessary in light of the economic potential of alternatives to it, such as cogeneration and conservation.

These requirements are critical in order to direct the FERC to permit the inclusion of CWIP in rate base only when such inclusion is likely to be in the interest of the utility's ratepayers.

Prepared by Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power 2/3/84.

CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS—IS IT FAIR TO MAKE CONSUMERS PAY "UP FRONT?"

(Prepared by Fair Electric Rates Coalition, January 1984)

WHAT IS CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS?

Construction work in progress, or CWIP, is the cost that an electric utility incurs as it builds new generating or transmission facilities.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN TO PUT CWIP IN RATE BASE?

CWIP entitles a private utility to earn a return on plants not yet providing electricity.

Utility commissions set consumers' electric bills by first calculating a utility's rate base—the amount invested in plant and equipment actually in service less depreciation. A percentage rate of return is then applied against the rate base to provide the private utility with a reasonable opportunity to repay its financial obligations and earn a fair profit. If CWIP is added to a utility's rate base, the dollar value of that base is expanded. Thus, the utility is not only compensated for its existing facilities, but earns a return on those under construction.

HOW HAVE UTILITY COMMISSIONS TREATED CWIP IN THE PAST?

Traditionally, utility commissions required consumers to pay only for facilities that were "used and useful," that is, plant and equipment generating or transmitting electricity. While facilities were under construction, utilities calculated their financing costs which were collected from ratepayers after plants went into service.

Several years ago, some private utilities said they could no longer construct plants without immediate financial assistance from ratepayers. They asked commissions to depart from the "used and useful" principle. Some utility commissions, including the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC), deviated from this principle on a case-by-case basis where they found utility financial need for extraordinary rate relief.

WHY IS CWIP A CONTROVERSIAL ISSUE?

Consumers have vigorously opposed attempts by private utilities to make them pay for facilities that are not yet capable of providing electricity. This sentiment is even stronger today because many utilities are performing well financially, and thus have no need for extraordinary rate relief. CWIP has not only become a serious regulatory issue, but a volatile political one too. Statutes or initiatives to prohibit CWIP in retail rates have been passed in four states—New Hampshire, Oregon, Missouri and Pennsylvania. In 1983, Texas adopted a law limiting CWIP in rate base. Many other states effectively prohibit or severely restrict CWIP in retail rates. Grassroots efforts are underway to have similar policies adopted in additional states.

DOES NOT A PLANT COST LESS WITH CWIP?

Under certain economic assumptions, a plant may cost less with CWIP than undr traditional regulations

DOES THIS MEAN THAT CWIP IS IN CONSUMERS' FINANCIAL INTEREST?

No. Lower plant costs do not mean lower rates. And CWIP is bad consumer policy for many other reasons.

First, consumers are compelled to pay millions of dollars immediately in higher electric rates.

Second, consumers are denied the current use of their money to meet subsistence needs, install conservation devices, or invest. Consumers' purchasing power will be greater if they retain their money and invest it at a rate at least equal to a utility's cost of capital. Also, wholesale customers, which are utilities themselves, lose some capital which could be invested in their own generating plants.

Third, consumers' "pocketbooks" are unprotected because utility managers are no longer disciplined by the financial marketplace. Billions of dollars are at stake when a utility decides to construct a power plant. Utilities have much less economic incentive to evaluate conservation, load management, or alternative energy resources when they're effectively guaranteed a return on investment from consumers in a new power plant under construction.

Finally, consumers take a substantial risk that they will never benefit from their CWIP contribution. Over the last 10 years, well over 100 electric plants were cancelled after more than $10 billion had been spent on them. If consumers had paid CWIP, they would have contributed funds for plants which will never generate electricity. And in an increasingly older and more mobile society, many people would be charged CWIP, but would never receive power from facilities completed many years later.

DOES FERC ALLOW CWIP?

Yes. FERC allows utilities to apply for CWIP related to installation of pollution control facilities, conversion of oil- or gas-fired plants to other fuels, and prior to 1983, cases where a company was in "severe financial difficulty." During 1983, FERC abandoned its "financial distress" policy by permitting any utility, regardless of its financial condition, to place half its CWIP costs in rate base for wholesale customers. However, for the first two years that the rule is in effect, inclusion of CWIP cannot raise rates by more than 6 percent annually.

HAVE ANY UTILITIES APPLIED FOR CWIP UNDER THE NEW FERC RULE?

Yes. Utilities throughout the country are filing or collecting CWIP-based rates under the new rule. The rate increases range from $457,000 to $50 million.

WILL RETAIL CONSUMERS BE AFFECTED BY FERC'S RULE?

Yes. The rule will immediately affect consumers whose local public or private power systems buy electricity from an investor owned utility currently building new facilities.

The electric rates of many more consumers could be raised if utilities reorganize themselves into a corporation such as New England Electric System (NEES). NEES is a holding company with a generating subsidiary, New England Power Company (NEPCO). NEPCO sells power to NEES distribution subsidiaries, such as Massachusetts Electric. By selling power within this "corporate umbrella," NEES' wholesale transactions are regulated by FERC. If other utilities follow this example and set up separate generating and distribution companies, they would benefit by the liberal FERC rule on CWIP and would escape restrictive state policies denying them such relief. In fact, several private utilities have proposed such a reorganization. All consumers of these utilities would then be affected by FERC's CWIP rule.

DO UTILITIES NEED THE FERC RULE TO "PREVENT THE LIGHTS FROM GOING OUT?"

No. Today, the country has nearly 40 percent excess generating capacity. Twenty percent is deemed to be a prudent level of reserves. A 1983 Congressional Research Service (CRS) study indicates that between now and the the year 2000, there should be sufficient generating capacity to meet the nation's power needs with reasonable improvements in energy efficiencies. If demand exceeds present projections, CRS says there should be ample time to make adjustments.

IS CONGRESS RESPONDING TO THE FERC RULE?

Yes. Legislation to limit FERC's authority to allow CWIP in wholesale rates has been introduced. In the House, H.R. 555 is awaiting action on the floor. In the Senate, S. 817 and S. 1069 are pending in the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

DO THESE BILLS PROHIBIT CWIP?

No. All three bills permit CWIP for pollution control facilities and plant conversions from oil or natural gas to other fuels. In addition, H.R. 555 allows a utility with a substantial construction program to apply for CWIP if its program is consistent with a least-cost energy strategy, the company is unable to attract capital at reasonable rates, and such relief will not place wholesale customers at a competitive disadvantage. Similarly, S. 1069 permits CWIP if a utility is in "severe financial difficulty."

ARE THESE BILLS IN THE CONSUMERS' INTEREST?

Yes. Consumers will pay CWIP only when extraordinary rate relief is truly justified, either to achieve important national policy objectives such as reducing utility emissions, or when a utility demonstrates it has a genuine financial need, its construction program follows a least-cost energy plan, and it could not provide electricity to its customers without extraordinary rate relief.

WHAT CAN BE DONE TO ENSURE CONSUMERS ARE TREATED FAIRLY BY FERC?

Congress should enact H.R. 555 and S. 1069 to ensure FERC meets its responsibilities under the Federal Power Act—to respond to the financial needs of private utilities, while also protecting consumers from excessive and unjustified rate increases.

BLACK HISTORY IN PRINCE GEORGES COUNTY

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, a few years ago an historic sites and districts plan was developed for Prince Georges County, Md., much of which I represent. This plan surveyed the many historic homes and manors located in the area, and reviewed the lifestyles, history, and cultural developments of the people who lived in them. The plan concentrated on the white colonists and settlers and their heritage, and one of the recommendations of the report was that a real need existed to document the lives and communities of the black residents of the area—the slaves, the free men and women, often the backbone of the white society which existed at this time.

History has often ignored this aspect of American life, and it was feared that many important sites would be lost to the wrecker's ball unless action was taken. The Maryland National Capital Park and Planning Commission, acting upon the direction of the Prince Georges County Council, recognized this very obvious and serious need, and it set about to investigate the rich and varied heritage of the black community here in Maryland. Miss Bianca Floyd was hired by the history division and has undertaken this task. Her research has already brought to the public's attention many facets of the growth and development of the black community. I feel that it is most fitting, during the month of February which is designated as Black History Month, to review some of her findings.

From the records of early slaves at George Calvert's mansion to the development in the early 1900's of communities by and for thriving black professionals, the history is filled with moving and amazing stories.

Perhaps nowhere is this more evident than in the chronicle of a single family who lived through these times, the Plummers. From Cupid Plummer, who fought in the Revolutionary War came a family whose progeny was to affect much of the religious, educational, and social development of the area around today's towns of Riverdale and Bladensburg. It is a fascinating story and one which I will briefly outline here.

Cupid Plummer fought for 7 years in the Revolutionary War as a surrogate for his master, John Hodge. His son Barney was owned by George H. Calvert, descendant of Lord Baltimore, who had a large landholding at Goodwood. Among Barney's many children was Adam Francis who grew up with Calvert's son, Charles. The close ties between these two men were to aid Adam throughout his life until Emancipation. When Adam was 10 years old, the Calvert family moved to Riverdale, to the site that still stands known as the Calvert Mansion. There Adam learned to read and write, which, at the time was considered a crime for a slave. Through this action, we have the family history of this remarkable time, for Adam, from the year 1841 to 1905, kept a diary. In 1927 one of his children, Nellie Arnold Plummer, used this document to write "Out of the Depths or the Triumph of the Cross," a chronicle of the Plummer family.

In 1841 Adam married Emily Saunders who lived at "Three Sisters" manor 8 miles away from the Calvert Mansion in Riverdale. For the next 10 years Adam would be allowed to visit his wife only on weekends which he reached by walking the distance to her farm, as each spouse had different "masters." During this time they had six children; Sarah Miranda, Henry Vinton, Elias Quincy, Julia Ann, Nicholas, and Marjory Ellen Rose. The last child died soon after she was born.

This 10-year span saw much development in the Plummer family. They were hard working, religious, and close-knit. Adam had a knack for horticulture, and Calvert allowed him to use 3 or 4 acres of ground for himself. As a result he always had money of his own, which was to prove very useful during the times that lay ahead of him. For in 1851, Emily and four of her children were sold to a family called Thompson, and they moved to Washington, D.C. Her oldest child, Sarah Miranda, was sold to a trader and taken to New Orleans. It was a difficult parting for all, and it became more so as this new family again moved to Mount Hebron, 20 miles distant. Visits were almost impossible, and to travel, Adam required several passes and much documentation. Added to this was the fact that the new master was extremely rough to Emily and often whipped her until she was finally able to get his wife to intercede and stop this treatment. Semiannual visits and numerous letters kept the bond strong between the two, and over the next years they had three more children, Margaret Jane and twins, Robert Francis and Nellie Arnold.

With Emancipation came a final reuniting of this family at "Mount Rose," a 10-acre property given to Adam by Charles Calvert. He was to remain there until his death at the age of 87.

It is with the children of Adam and Emily that we see the real influence of this remarkable union. Despite being carted from place to place, being led to the auction block and sold like cattle, despite living through mistreatment by bad owners, with war all around them, these young men and women took from their parents and their heritage a strength of character and will that molded them into leaders.

Sarah Miranda, sold at the age of 18 and carried off to New Orleans far from her family, found her solace in God. During her years in New Orleans, she joined the First African Baptist Church and was baptized in 1864. Finally found in Louisiana by her brother, Henry, she returned with him to Mount Rose and founded the St. Paul's Baptist Church. She was also one of the founding members of the Bladensburg Union, a community and beneficial society.

Her brother Henry had fled the confines of slavery and the Thompson household and joined the Union forces during the Civil War. After going, at the age of 22 to New Orleans to retrieve his sister, he returned to Riverdale and became the force behind the Bladensburg Burying Association, a society formed to provide burial insurance, compensation for the sick, disabled, and unemployed as well as support services for other emergencies. Later the organization was renamed the Bladensburg Union. It is still serving the St. Paul's church community to this day. Henry was also a founding trustee and chief organizer of the new school society. This group organized the first school for blacks in Bladensburg during reconstruction. Later he became a chaplain in the U.S. Army and settled in the Midwest.

Brother Elias Cupid Quincy Plummer taught school and was a choir master. He also became an influential Methodist minister.

His sister Julia Ann Caroline Maria Plummer was a seamstress, and, despite ill health, graduated at the age of 43 to become a nurse and teacher.

The birth of twins came as a mixed blessing to the Plummer household. Caught in the midst of a tumultuous time, when Sarah was being sold to a slave trader, their future was uncertain to many in the family. But mother Emily said, "Never mind, something tells me that these two children will never have to suffer as we have. This boy is going to be a doctor and the girl is going to be a school teacher. Remember, thoughts are things."

Emily was right. Robert, born just 2 years and 3 months before Emancipation, went to Cornell University, and Howard University where he received his doctorate in pharmacy. His twin,

Nellie Arnold, became a widely known singer of gospel and sacred music, and was a teacher for 45 years, in Maryland, Virginia, and the District. It was she who used Adam's diary and wrote the family biography.

Adam's influence went even further. He taught Emily's brother, William Robert Arnold, how to read, an act that was to have a profound influence on his life. Because he was so knowledgeable his master sent him to Washington, D.C., where he was strongly influenced by the Abolitionists. He escaped on the underground railroad into Canada, and later went to Ohio where he became a minister. He had a series of very successful parishes in Mount Pisgah, Havre de Grace, Baltimore, Cambridge, St. John's, and St. Paul's, and he capped his career with a Bachelor of Divinity at Howard University.

As Miss Floyd points out in many of her writings, the history and leadership of the Plummer family provides an excellent example of a black family's struggle both in slavery and in freedom. Unlike the "Roots" saga, by Alex Haley, which relied mostly on oral history, this family's story is based upon the actual accounts of a slave who wrote about his life in bondage. It is a story of strength and courage and hardship, and it is an integral part of our own history.

Mr. Speaker, the story of the Plummer family is but one of many thousands to be found all across this Nation. I commend the efforts of Miss Floyd and the Maryland National Capital Park and Planning Commission for undertaking the task of uncovering an important part of our history, and I urge my colleagues to promote similar kinds of endeavors in their home districts.●

LET US DO MORE TO END THE TRAGEDY OF CYPRUS

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of my colleagues in the House to a report from the President. The bimonthly report on Cyprus spells out what progress is being made toward a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus problem. The report focuses on the recent Turkish Cypriot declaration of statehood. Although I am pleased that our Government condemned the illegal declaration and understand the complexity of the issue, I believe much more must be done to resolve this long-festering problem.

As all of you know, Turkish troops invaded Cyprus nearly 8 years ago. During the intervening 9 years, families are still separated from one another and over 200,000 refugees have been forced from their homes and villages. Approximately 40 percent of the island is under Turkish Cypriot control, thereby depriving the native Cypriots of self-determination.

Not only has this occupation imposed a political hardship on the people of Cyprus, it has enacted a heavy economic, social, and cultural burden as well. From a strategic perspective, the United States also has legitimate concerns. At the very time that the Soviet Union is enhancing its power in the Mediterranean, NATO's southern flank is weakened by the Greek-Turkish clash over Cyprus. Not only do our southern flank partners disagree over military control and tactics in the region, U.S. bases in Greece and Turkey have, in the past, been threatened with removal unless the conflict in Cyprus is resolved. In short, our entire defense posture in Southern Europe and the Middle East is in jeopardy.

What should America do in the face of this blatant attempt to dismember Cyprus. In addition to condemning the illegal declaration of statehood, our Government must continue its efforts to convince the Turkish Cypriot community to reverse its decision. In addition, we must aggressively pursue our efforts with the world community to convince them not to recognize that illegal entity. Although our lobbying efforts in the United Nation were successful and the Security Council called for a reversal of the declaration, we must not sit back and let this issue die on the vine.

We must increase the level of diplomatic and congressional contacts with the Government of Turkey and with the Turkish Cypriot community in Cyprus and explain to them the futility of their efforts to split a sovereign nation in half. In addition, our Government should not let the Turkish Cypriot community merely mouth platitudes about the situation on the island. Turkish Cypriot goodwill measures designed to settle some of the issues are not enough. Should our Government put this issue on the back burner, we will play into the hands of the Turkish Cypriots and basically tell them that the partition of Cyprus is a fait accompli. Should our country fail to apply maximum pressure on the illegal government of Mr. Denktash, we will be sanctioning an illegal act which violates international standards of justice, human rights, and international law.

With these concerns in mind, I recommend that all of my colleagues read the President's bimonthly report on progress on the Cyprus problem.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
January 24, 1984.

TEXT OF A LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT TO THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AND THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

DEAR MR. SPEAKER and MR. CHAIRMAN: In accordance with Public Law 95-384, I am submitting herewith a bimonthly report on progress toward a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus problem.

Since the previous report (Nov. 7, 1983) the Turkish Cypriot community declared its statehood. The declaration of November 15, 1983, was condemned by the Administration as unhelpful to the process of finding solutions. We urged reversal of the Turkish community's moves and called on all states of the world not to recognize the self-proclaimed entity. On November 18, 1983, we joined a nearly unanimous U.N. Security Council in passing resolution 541 which also called for reversal of the declaration and for no international recognition of the self-proclaimed entity.

Following the November 18, 1983, Security Council action, Cypriot President Kyprianou came to Washington where Secretary Shultz and I met with him to assure him of our opposition to the Turkish Cypriot move and of our continuing determination to see the Cyprus question settled fairly and finally. We also met with (then) Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen to whom we explained these same points. With both the Cypriot and Turkish government officials we urged flexibility in reacting to any opportunities for progress which may present themselves. The Secretary of State made a similar presentation to Greek Foreign Minister Haralambopoulos.

In early December 1983, State Department Counselor Edward Derwinski visited Greece and Cyprus to meet with Government leaders and private individuals for discussions of the situation on Cyprus. Several additional visits to Cyprus by members of the Congress took place during the period.

On December 15, 1983, the U.N. Security Council renewed the mandate for the U.N. Forces in Cyprus (UNFICYP) for another six months. (Secretary General's report of December 1 is attached.) The Turkish Cypriot community did not support the terms of this renewal but its leaders have said they will continue to cooperate with U.N. forces in their peacekeeping role.

On January 2, 1984, the Government of Turkey announced its intention to remove 1,500 of its troops from Cyprus. On the same day Mr. Denktash, leader of the Turkish Cypriot community, announced a series of "goodwill" measures designed to settle some of the outstanding issues between the communities. Included among these were proposals to turn over the city of Varosha and the Nicosia airport to U.N. administration, reactivation of the Committee on Missing Persons, and several other confidence-building measures. The Administration welcomed these proposals as being movement in the right direction.

On January 9, 1984, President Kyprianou again visited Washington during a private visit to the U.S. and discussed with Secretary Shultz and others his Government's ideas on how to achieve progress toward a comprehensive settlement.

The Secretary of State's Special Cyprus Coordinator Richard Haass and other Department officials have maintained close liaison with U.N. officials involved with the Cyprus question. We continue to support the Secretary General's good offices role.

During the period, the Administration has encouraged the parties to the Cyprus question to be forthcoming with new ideas for progress and not to reject out of hand any proposals for progress. We believe the January 2, 1984 proposals from the Turkish side and the plans discussed with President Kyprianou in November and in January constitute positive results. We intend to continue our strong support for the U.N. Secretary General's role in the search for solutions to the Cyprus problem.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., January 27, 1984.

DEAR MR. BROOMFIELD: Knowing of your keen interest in the Cyprus situation, I am taking the liberty of sending you a copy of the President's latest 60-day report on Cyprus, which was recently released. Richard Haass, Secretary Shultz's Special Cyprus Coordinator, would be pleased to discuss with you this report as well as other recent developements on Cyprus.

We look forward to working with you and your colleagues in the Congress to help resolve the Cyprus problem.

Sincerely,

W. TAPLEY BENNETT, Jr.
Assistant Secretary,
Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs.●

THERAPEUTIC USE OF HEROIN

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Mr. LELAND, Mr. SCHEUER, Mr. MARKEY, Mr. SHARP, Mr. WHITEHURST, Mrs. HALL of Indiana, Mr. WEISS, Mr. STARK, Mr. LEVINE of California, Mr. LEVINE of Michigan, Mr. BONIOR of Michigan, Mr. NOWAK, Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana, Mr. ACKERMAN, Mr. FRENZEL, Mr. FORD of Tennessee, Mr. WON PAT, Mr. FRANK, Mr. CONYERS, Mr. SPENCE, and Mr. BARNES, I am pleased to announce the introduction of H.R. 4762, the Compassionate Pain Relief Act. The legislation would permit establishment of a temporary program through which heroin—diacetylmorphine—would be made available by the Federal Government to physicians to relieve the agony of cancer patients suffering intractable pain.

The need for this legislation is great. The ability of the terminally ill to live out their last months and weeks in comfort—without pain—is often denied due to arbitrary restrictions on the therapeutic use of heroin.

The National Cancer Institute estimates that as many as 33 percent of cancer patients will require drug therapy for the relief of pain. While a majority of these patients can be adequately treated with conventional analgesics, there is an important group of patients of whom the pain of cancer is often more fearsome than the disease itself. These patients are often highly tolerant to conventional analgesics or are emaciated, which makes frequent injections difficult and painful.

The safety and effectiveness of heroin in the treatment of pain has been well established. Although its use in medicine was at one time permitted in this country, fears over its addictive properties and concerns associated with illicit abuse resulted in its ban. Tragically, banning the therapeutic use of heroin has had little effect on the incidence of heroin abuse, but it has impacted on those who could benefit from its use in treatment of pain.

Heroin is recognized by pharmacologists and physicians worldwide as one of the most effective analgesics known to medical science. It is a potent, highly soluble pain killer, and therefore an excellent analgesic for patients unable to tolerate frequent high volume injections of drugs like morphine or for whom drugs like dilaudid are contraindicated. Experts testified before the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment in 1980 that heroin is no more addicting than other legally available narcotics and that in the treatment of pain—particularly intractable pain due to cancer—pain management, rather than addiction, should be the principle therapeutic consideration.

H.R. 4762 provides for establishment of a temporary program, administered by the Secretary of Health and Human Services, to provide therapeutic quantities of diacetylmorphine to physicians for the treatment of intractable pain in patients suffering from cancer. The temporary program will end 4 years after enactment.

This program is limited in scope, and will require individual registration of participating pharmacies and physicians. It will operate in much the same fashion as existing Federal programs sponsored by the National Cancer Institute and the National Institute on Drug Abuse, through which limited quantities of marihuana cigarettes and THC capsules are available to approved physicians and pharmacies for use in research activities to control the nausea of cancer chemotherapy.

The legislation also provides that strict safeguards and reporting requirements be observed similar to those currently in place to prevent diversion of legally available narcotics like morphine or dilaudid. Distribution or possession of heroin outside the limited scope of this program would continue to constitute a violation of the Federal Controlled Substances Act and be subject to maximum penalties of 15 years imprisonment and a $125,000 fine.

A similar bill, S. 209, has been sponsored in the Senate by Senators INOUYE, DECONCINI, GOLDWATER, LEAHY, MATSUNAGA, PELL, RANDOLPH, RIEGLE, SYMMS, TSONGAS, WARNER, GLENN, ABDNOR, LEVIN of Michigan, HATFIELD, DOMENICI, PACKWOOD, MCCLURE, and HOLLINGS.

Mr. Speaker, no one should assume that heroin is a wonder drug or that passage of H.R. 4762 will eliminate very real deficiencies that exist in clinical knowledge about pain managment. Heroin may not be the analgesic of choice for most cancer patients. Yet heroin is a highly effective analgesic which may offer individual patients benefits not available with conventional medications. It should be available as one of many drugs in a cancer physician's armamentarium available to treat patients suffering from the intractable pain often caused by cancer.

Mr. Speaker, I urge every Member's support. Enactment of H.R. 4762 would provide hope to thousands of cancer patients and their families.

I insert a copy of H.R. 4762 in the RECORD at this point:

H.R. 4762

A bill to establish a temporary program under which diacetylmorphine will be made available through qualified pharmacies for the relief of pain from cancer

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Compassionate Pain Relief Act".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds the following:

(1) Cancer is a progressive, degenerative, and often painful disease which afflicts one out of every four Americans and is the second leading cause of death.

(2) In the progression of cancer, a significant number of patients will experience levels of severe, intense, and intractable pain which cannot be effectively treated by presently available medication.

(3) The therapeutic use of diacetylmorphine is not permitted in the United States but extensive clinical research has demonstrated that it is a potent, highly soluble painkilling drug when properly formulated and administered under a physician's supervision.

(4) Making diacetylmorphine available to patients through controlled channels as a drug for the relief of pain due to cancer is in the public interest.

(5) The availability of diacetylmorphine for the limited purposes of pain control due to cancer will not adversely affect the abuse of illicit drugs or increase the incidence of pharmacy thefts.

(6) The availability of diacetylmorphine will enhance the ability of physicians to effectively treat and control pain due to cancer and promote further research.

(7) It is appropriate for the Federal government to establish a temporary program to provide pharmaceutical dosage forms of diacetylmorphine for the control of pain in those limited circumstances in which conventional analgesics are ineffective or contraindicated.

SEC. 3. (a) Not later than October 1, 1984, the Secretary of Health and Human Services (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") shall issue regulations establishing a program under which diacetylmorphine shall be made available to pharmacies for dispensing pursuant to written prescriptions of physicians to individuals for the relief of pain from cancer (hereinafter in this section referred to as "the program").

(b) The Secretary shall provide for the manufacture of diacetylmorphine for dispensing under the program.

(c) Under the program diacetylmorphine may only be made available, upon application, to pharmacies registered under section 302 of the Controlled Substances Act which meet such qualifications as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe. An application for diacetylmorphine shall—

(1) be in such form and submitted in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe; and

(2) contain assurances satisfactory to the Secretary that—

(A) the applicant meets such special requirements as the Secretary may prescribe respecting the storage and dispensing of diacetylmorphine; and

(B) diacetylmorphine provided under the application will be dispensed through the applicant upon the written prescription of a physician registered under section 302 of the Controlled Substances Act to dispense controlled substances in schedule II of such Act.

Requirements prescribed by the Secretary under paragraph (2)(A) shall be designed to protect against the diversion into illicit channels of diacetylmorphine distributed under the program but such requirements may not be more stringent than those in effect under the Controlled Substances Act for the distribution of controlled substances in schedule II of such Act.

(d) A physician registered under section 302 of the Controlled Substances Act may prescribe diacetylmorphine for individuals for the relief of pain from cancer. Any such prescription shall be in writing as prescribed by the Secretary by regulations.

(e) The Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act and titles II and III of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 shall not apply with respect to—

(1) the importing of opium,

(2) the manufacture of diacetylmorphine, and

(3) the distribution and dispensing of diacetylmorphine, in accordance with the program.

SEC. 4. (a) Not later than the third month beginning after the date of the enactment of this section and every third month thereafter until the program is established under section 3, the Secretary shall report to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the Senate on the activities undertaken to implement the program; and each year after the program is established and while it is in effect, the Secretary shall report to such Committees on the activities under the program during the period for which the report is submitted.

(b) Upon the expiration of four years after the date the program is established, the Comptroller General of the United States shall report to the committees referred to in paragraph (1) on the activities under the program during such four years.

(c) The program established under subsection (a) shall terminate upon the expiration of sixty months after the date the program is established.●

OIL COMPANY ACQUISITIONS

● Mr. DASCHLE. It is not very often that those of us outside the inner circles of the giant oil corporations get a chance to see how these companies work, and what the effects of their actions will have on us. That is why I was particularly pleased to see a recent interview with J. Hugh Liedtke, chairman of the board of Pennzoil. In the interview, sparked by Pennzoil's action in filing an antitrust suit against Texaco's proposed merger with Getty Oil, Chairman Liedtke provides a refreshing, frank appraisal of what the recent surge in takeover activity by various major oil companies means to the oil industry and the American consumer.

Of particular interest is his comment that "based on studies, 79 percent of all the oil in the world is controlled by about 16 companies. So once you get oil controlled that way, and, more particularly, you get domestic reserves controlled by a very few companies, then what do you think is going to happen to the price? Just the same thing that happened in the game of Monopoly. You can set the darned rate anywhere you want to."

It is this continuing tendency on the part of major oil companies to increase their reserves not by exploration but by acquisition that reduces competition and drives up the price of all petroleum products. Chairman Liedtke's comments provide an insight into these operations and a real warning of where, if left unchecked, they will lead us.

The interview follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 29, 1984]

PENNZOIL CHIEF: OIL GIANTS PLAY MONOPOLY WITH REAL MONEY

(The battle between Pennzoil Corp. and Texaco Inc. for control of Getty Oil Co. appeared to be winding down last week, as Texaco raised its bid for Getty to $10.1 billion and gained the unanimous approval of the several factions of the Getty family, while Pennzoil was making little headway in its attempts to halt the merger in court.)

(Pennzoil officials have argued throughout that the amalgamation of Texaco and Getty has potentially serious implications for the oil industry and national energy policy. In an interview last week, Pennzoil Chairman J. Hugh Liedtke discussed these issues with staff writer Mark Potts. Here are some excerpts from the interview:)

Question. There have been a lot of events in the oil industry in the past couple of months: the Getty situation, T. Boone Pickens Jr.'s fight to change Gulf, and Mobil's royalty trust filing. Do you think these signal any kind of an upheaval in the industry?

Answer. I'm not sure how connected everything is. If the Getty-Texaco merger were to be permitted under the antitrust laws, then I think you're going to see a tremendous upheaval in the industry which would entail the few very large companies gobbling up all of the medium-sized and smaller companies. It may not happen overnight, but it's going to happen fairly fast.

Q: You filed an antitrust suit against Texaco and Getty. What are your objections?

A: Well, in antitrust, the traditional types of [problems] are overlaps of markets, of refining capacities, and so on. This merger would violate almost any kind of criteria you want to use in those areas. . . .

But the bigger problem—let me get at it this way: Perhaps years ago you played Monopoly—that was a very famous game, everybody played, and the name of the game was Monopoly. The way it worked was, as I recall it, you started out with a group of properties and a little bit of money. And then, pretty soon, why you built some houses on the properties and you got rental income, and as you got enough rental income, you built hotels. And you got more rental income. And pretty soon, you had more income than one of the other players, so you bought him out. And then you had more than three or four players in the game. So you either bought them out or you forced them out in bankruptcy through the bank.

Well now, in the oil business, we have the same identical game going on. In our case, the land is leases—oil and gas leases—which in Texas, at any rate, is an interest in real estate. Instead of building houses, we drill wells, and that's where we get our income. And where you can drill a bunch of wells, instead of having a hotel, you have a huge tank battery or tank farm. You have a whole lot of money. And then the next thing that happens, you buy someone out, or you buy them in a bankruptcy proceeding.

The point I'm getting at is that, if that is allowed to continue with these great big companies, pretty soon you're only going to have a half dozen of them and you will have true monopoly, just like you did in that game.

Then the question arises, what difference does that make to the American public? Well, it makes this difference: In our business, in the future the big reserves of oil and gas are going to be found in frontier areas, at a great depth principally, and probably through tertiary recovery. When I say this, I'm talking about areas like the Bering Sea, I'm talking about offshore Alaska, I'm talking about the Overthrust Belt in the western United States, and there's another Overthrust Belt in the eastern part of the United States that runs down through Pennsylvania and New York and so on. These areas take enormous amounts of money to play [in], and if medium-sized companies are taken out of that play and can't bid in, then you're going to lose a lot of competition for finding new oil.

I think we're got to bear in mind constantly that this Texaco thing will add more oil for Texaco, [but] it's not going to add one single barrel of oil for the United States or the people here. And what it's going to do is, to cause money to be taken away from exploration, to pay off the debt that Texaco acquires in buying these properties.

You know, based on studies that we've looked at that Arthur Anderson & Co. has done, 79 percent of all the oil in the world is controlled by about 16 companies. So once you get oil controlled that way, and, more particularly, you get domestic reserves controlled by a very few companies, then what do you think's going to happen to price? Just the same thing that happened in the game of Monopoly. You can set the darned rent anywhere you want to.

Q: Couldn't that argument be applied also, though to the joining of Pennzoil and Getty?

A: Well, you can apply it, but it's not valid. Getty's about the 14th-largest company, and Pennzoil is way down in the twenties somewhere. In the Texaco situation, you've got the third-largest oil company in the world, or at least in this country, combining with Getty which is, what did we say, 14th. So you form the second-largest oil company in the United States next to Exxon, and, in the process, Texaco eliminates a competitor, and a fairly strong one.

But if you put Pennzoil and Getty together, you will create a much stronger competitor, insofar as Texaco is concerned. So instead of eliminating one, you really strengthen one and make them far more competitive with [Texaco].

Q: Texaco makes the same arguments about needing the additional size and the additional resources to be able to find oil in frontier areas.

A: You know, that rings pretty hollow to anybody, and I really don't even hardly think that's worth commenting on. The size of that company already speaks for itself. There are two ways of doing business in the oil business. One is their way, and one is the way everybody else does business. And to say that they need to get bigger is absolutely ridiculous.

What they're trying to do is to eliminate a competitor and to prevent a really tough one from being created while they buy some oil that will help their company's profit. But it's not going to help anybody in this country, any of our citizens.

Q: You've mentioned a fear of congressional action or some sort of governmental action against the industry triggered by the Texaco-Getty deal.

A: You're asking for it when you do it. They have seen what happened in the Mobil situation [when Mobil tried to buy Marathon Oil in 1981]. This deal's twice as big as the Mobil deal. And at some point, they're going to stop it. In theory, you end up with one oil company and in practice you'll end up with a half a dozen, but it's going to be a really tough situation.

Q: You talked before about how a Texaco-Getty deal doesn't add a single barrel of oil to the public reserve, for public use. How does Pennzoil-Getty?

A: I think the difference is that, in terms of our total picture, I think we would be in a position to finance this in such a way that we would have more funds available than we—Pennzoil—now have, or than Getty now has, to go look for oil. In other words, we would get out of some of these businesses that they currently are in and redirect the cash flow differently, redirect the emphasis of the company. . . .

Our track record would indicate that we can do better with the money than they can—than either one of them. We would have to pay off debt, just like they would. But then we would try to redirect funds toward a heavier emphasis on exploration. And I think the odds of our having success, if you base it on the past record of the company, is better than either one of their's, considerably better.

Q: There is—and I'm sure you're aware of this—a public perception of your industry as a sort of monolith, with everyone pointing in the same direction, everybody searching for bigness and monopoly. Do you think this proves that that does or does not exist?

A: I do not think that the other very big oil companies think that this is a wise thing. I have not talked to them, that's just my impression. But I don't think that they feel it's in the interest of the industry to do something like Texaco has done. I think they feel that it will rebound to the industry's detriment for exactly the reasons that you pointed out when you asked me the question.

Q: The fear of oil companies growing larger?

A: Exactly. You do have to have size to play in these areas that I talked about to you, and the only way to have enough money is to be reasonably large. But there comes a point in the Monopoly game when you get so much money that, at that point, you ought to just compete and not be buying things. You ought to have to go out and create things of your own rather than buy up somebody's life's work overnight.●

MELVIN OLIVER BENSON

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I would like to recognize the distinguished service rendered to our Nation by a former committee staff member, Mr. Melvin Oliver Benson, who died very suddenly and unexpectedly on January 25 of this year.

"Benny" Benson, as he was known to his Capitol Hill colleagues, served as a staff consultant to the Committee on Foreign Affairs from 1963 until 1972, when he retired from a long and honorable period of Government service. Although originally appointed at the recommendation of the late Hon. Frances Bolton of Ohio, the distinguished ranking minority member of the committee at that time, he served in a bipartisan capacity throughout the course of his committee employment.

Mr. Benson's service to the United States was, however, by no means limited to his congressional tenure: He was, in fact, a highly decorated World War II intelligence officer, who served both with British Secret Intelligence in the Middle East (1942-43) and with the U.S. Army Office of Strategic Services (OSS) from 1943 until 1946. In 1943, he parachuted into Yugoslavia and was the first American to establish direct contact with the partisan forces under Marshal Tito, a feat which subsequently earned him the Legion of Merit. The key role Mr. Benson played in Allied wartime operations in Yugoslavia has been covered extensively in historical accounts of that period. On several subsequent occasions, he was invited to visit with his wartime comrades-in-arms as an official guest of the Yugoslav Government.

Mr. Benson also was awarded the King Haakon medal for his OSS service in Norway immediately following World War II. In 1946, he began a series of foreign affairs-related assignments, which included service as a special investigator for the House Military Affairs Committee (1946-47), an overseas representative of Pepsi Cola International (in 13 countries in Latin America, Africa, Europe, and the Far East), and an industrial development advisor in Nigeria under the auspices of the Agency for International Development.

Above all, however, "Benny" Benson will be remembered by his colleagues as someone who was invariably conscientious, good-natured, and determined to serve the interests of his country to the best of his ability.

To his family and his many friends in this area, I extend my deepest sympathy.●

ROUKEMA LAUDS WARREN COUNTY VOCATIONAL TECHNICAL SCHOOL

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, during the week of February 12, the Warren County Vocational Technical School will be celebrating National Vocational Education Week.

This school, located in Washington, N.J., has an excellent educational program, teaching students subjects as diverse as automobile mechanics and cosmetology and as important to our country's future as computer technology and electronics.

It is important to note that vocational/technical schools provide students the opportunity to develop skills that are needed in the work force today, and in the future. I also must comment that the guidance staff at the Warren County Vocational Technical School make a sincere effort to forecast the potential of employment available to students either upon graduation from high school or from an institution of higher education.

Warren County Vocational Technical School should also be commended for recently receiving an award from the New Jersey School Board Association for the Award of Excellence for school district information guides and parent handbooks.

Mr. Speaker, this country's vocational technical schools are most important to the future of this country. They should not be overlooked as vehicles by which to better educate our Nation's youth and give them the necessary skills with which to enter the work force.●

TRIBUTE TO THE MOUNT LEBANON HIGH SCHOOL FOOTBALL TEAM

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, in our society, the successes and accomplishments of underdogs are admired and respected. These successes are heralded whether done by individuals or by groups. We have all heard of such achievements in education, business, medicine, exploration, sports, entertainment, and a myriad of other fields. The fulfillment of a goal after a long period of hard work is a reward in itself but I want to further recognize a great achievement recently in the field of sports in my district.

The Western Pennsylvania Interscholastic Athletic League (WPIAL) recently crowned its new quad-A football champions, the Mount Lebanon High School Blue Devils. Their accomplishment is not an ordinary one in that their regular season record of 5-4-1 barely qualified them for entry into the WPIAL division I, quad-A playoffs. Very little was expected of a team with such a record but consecutive hard-fought wins over Connellsville and Butler and then, finally over an excellent North Allegheny High School team in the championship game, brought Mount Lebanon its third title in the past 4 years.

The Mount Lebanon School District has an excellent reputation which is well deserved and a true reflection of the concern and active involvement of the Mount Lebanon community in its educational system. Over the years, the same environment which produces champions in football has consistently graduated numerous national merit scholars as well. I am grateful for the education I received in the Mount Lebanon schools and I know the educational and athletic standards remain high.

Mount Lebanon Head Coach Art Walker and his staff deserve much credit for their hard work and dedication to the team. The school administration and student body can take pride in their support which was steadfast during good times and bad. And, finally, the players deserve a great tribute for consistently reaching beyond their individual potentials to achieve a common goal which many thought was unachievable.

I know my colleagues join me in saluting the 1983-84 Mount Lebanon Blue Devil football team, WPIAL quad-A champions. The lessons learned by individuals in working together toward a mutual goal can only help these young people in the years ahead. I want to add my congratulations and best wishes to all those involved on a job so well done.●

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, due to my absence from the House, I was not present and voting on January 31 or February 2. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following way:

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31

On the Gingrich line-item veto amendment to H.R. 2878, "aye."

On final passage of H.R. 2878, Library Services and Construction Act Amendments, "yea."

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2

On the Chandler substitute amendment that sought to strike certain infants at-risk provisions and direct HHS to establish guidelines for advisory committees to provide advice on the care and treatment of seriously ill newborns, to H.R. 1904, "paired against."

On the Miller amendment to H.R. 1904 that authorizes $15 million for fiscal year 1984, $20 million for 1985, and $30 million for 1986 for programs and projects to prevent family violence, "aye."

On final passage of H.R. 1904, Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, "yea."●

STANLEY FOUNDATION REPORT ON U.S. POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, last October the Stanley Foundation held its 24th annual Strategy for Peace Conference at the Airlie House Conference Center in Airlie, Va. One of the discussion groups at that conference was on U.S. policy in Central America. Participants in the discussion group included such distinguished individuals as former U.S. Ambassadors Robert E. White and John Crimmins. Rapporteur for the discussion group was Mr. Frank Record, who at that time was on the staff of the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus here in the Congress. In the interest of furthering informed debate on Central America in the Congress and the public, I include Mr. Record's report of the Central America discussion group in the RECORD at this point.

The material follows:

U.S. POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

There was little disagreement among the Central America group participants that the United States has important security, political and economic interests in the region. US foreign policy must protect US security interests in the region, safeguard the sea lanes and the Panama Canal, and promote economic development and growth.

Most participants agreed that US economic interests in the region were of secondary importance to security interests and concerns about superpower conflict in Central America. However, it was noted that economic revitalization and the promotion of trade in the region is a key factor in the long-term security of the United States and the Central American countries.

In a discussion of the tradeoff between short-term and long-term security interests, administration critics contended that short-term security objectives and the unquestioning support of human rights-violator countries such as El Salavador and Guatemala will effectively compromise our long-term goals of promoting democracy and human rights in those countries. Further, they argued, our short-term emphasis on a military solution and our refusal to negotiate with the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front/Democratic Revolutionary Front (FMLN/FDR) could bring about either a massive US military intervention in that country or the defeat of the Salvadoran army in the field. Either outcome would, of course, be highly damaging to US long-term objectives not only in Central America but throughout the Third World.

Administration supporters countered that military and security aid to friendly governments in the region provide a necessary "shield" for the development of democracy and pluralist institutions as well as for the revitalization of the economy. Additionally, they note, development and economic aid outnumber security aid by a margin of three to one.

It was asked whether a reduction of U.S. influence in Central America means a corresponding increase in the influence of the Soviet Union and its allies. Can we look at the security situation in the region as a "zero sum game" where one side's gain is another's loss? While it was generally agreed by the group that U.S. prestige and influence in the region are in decline and anti-Americanism is on the rise, most participants were of the opinion that this trend does not mean that the Soviet Union and its allies will enjoy a corresponding increase in popularity.

Numerous references in the discussion were made to a recent speech by U.S. Under Secretary of Defense for Policy Fred C. Ikle before the Baltimore Council on Foreign Affairs in which he affirmed that the primary purpose of our military aid program to El Salvador is the defeat of the Salvadoran guerrillas. Under the present limitations on U.S. military aid to El Salvador, almost all the participants were skeptical that this policy objective could be achieved without the intervention of U.S. troops in the region. Further, all the participants agreed that, at present, the U.S. public was not prepared to support this course of action.

While there was general agreement that strengthening democracy should be a key objective in the region, it was far from unanimous that administration policy was leading in that direction. As one participant put it, we should realize that elections are very different in Central America than they are in the United States. The stuffed ballot box, "La Urna Magica," is the rule not the exception. We should concern ourselves with the substance, not the form, of elections: after all, with the military in control in a country like El Salvador, elections are generally not very meaningful. While administration supporters contended that last year's elections in El Salvador and the large turnout of voters in that country proved that democracy was alive and well in El Salvador, its critics suggested that the long-term outcome of these elections only strengthened repressive forces in that country and effectively excluded participation of the Left.

Another question raised in the discussion centered around US reactions to revolution in the region. Was it in the United States' interest to allow revolutionary governments to take power in the region as long as they were not created or controlled by Moscow or Havana? Most of the participants did not believe that the present administration or any of its predecessors, for that matter, could tolerate any kind of a leftist government coming to power in the region. They cited the examples of Allende's Chile in 1973 and the Arbenz government in Guatemala in 1954 as examples of US-directed coups against socialist governments. The US fixation on avoiding leftist governments and removing them once they come into power has led some analysts to describe ours as a "policy of national insecurity."

EXTERNAL ACTORS

It was pointed out that the Reagan administration's policies of uncritical support of the right-wing repressive governments in El Salvador, Guatemala, and, to a certain extent, Honduras is forcing all revolutionary movements and guerrilla groups into the embrace of the Soviet Union and Cuba. Moreover, the administration does not generally distinguish between pro-Soviet and nonaligned leftist groups.

On the other hand, it was agreed that a key US objective in the region should be the reduction of Soviet and Cuban influence. In the case of Nicaragua, it was generally agreed that the best way to reduce the growing East-bloc influence and control in that country was through careful negotiations and reductions of tensions along the Honduran/Nicaraguan border rather than through a policy of military support for the anti-Sandinista rebels, contras, and strangulation of the economy.

Soviet policy in Central America seems designed to take careful advantage of US weaknesses and failures. The Soviet Union has given strong indications that it would not come to the aid of Nicaragua if the United States decided to intervene militarily. A number of participants posed the question of why the United States was scaling up the ladder of military escalation with its large-scale military maneuvers in the region and its increased support for the contras, while the Soviets seem to be behaving more cautiously, and the Nicaraguans are showing increased signs of willingness to negotiate on terms more acceptable to Washington.

One participant noted that the Cuban leader, Fidel Castro, has let it be known that he is prepared to improve relations with the United States and to consider terms under which Cuban advisers would be removed from Nicaragua. An understanding that both Cuba and the United States would respect the principle of noninterference and an agreement between the two countries that would lead to a pullout of foreign military advisers from Central America would, it was argued, be the key to the reduction of tensions in the region. Other participants were skeptical that Castro is an independent actor.

PRESENT AND ALTERNATIVE POLICIES IN THE REGION

Nicaragua

A number of participants remarked on the administration's continuing misjudgment of the political situation inside Nicaragua. In their view, the Sandinistas still enjoy some popular support, especially in areas where the contras are active.

Two approaches are evidenced by the administration's policy toward Nicaragua. The first is aimed at overthrowing the Sandinista regime. The second advocates that the United States maintain its economic and military pressure against the Managua government until it agrees to stop supporting the FMLN/FDR in El Salvador.

Most participants were generally pessimistic about the chances for a negotiated settlement under present circumstances and felt that the Contadora Group negotiations have not succeeded in large part because the United States did not want them to succeed.

It was argued that alternative policies are needed in Central America because the present policies are not working. Even if they were successful, they would not be in our long-term national interest. Deposing the Sandinistas would replace one set of problems with another: how would we extricate ourselves from that situation?

Most were generally hopeful that a negotiated settlement between the United States and Nicaragua was still possible and that the issue of exporting revolution, or "revolution without frontiers," should be included in these negotiations. It was suggested that we reach an agreement with the Sandinistas to the end that they stop all export of the revolution by material means and that they commit themselves to a policy of no military facilities for the Soviets or Cubans.

El Salvador

The situation inside El Salvador was not viewed as favorable: the economy continues in a tailspin with 3 percent negative growth predicted for this year, on top of an almost unbelievable 25 percent reduction in GNP over the last four years. The land reform program has been stopped dead in its tracks (with no credits or fertilizers given to farmers under Phase I and with a recent wave of evictions and no new titles issued under Phase III of the Land Reform program); human rights violations are on the upswing; the morale of the army is very low; and the guerrillas are showing increased signs of military strength due to more favorable weather conditions. Imparting human rights values to the Salvadoran military has proven to be much more difficult than the Reagan administration contends. Since the March 1982 elections, the balance of power has moved to the right: the death squads are more active than ever, and kidnapping and disappearances are on the rise.

It was pointed out that US policy makers face stark choices in El Salvador. With the replacement of General Garcia by General Vides Cassanova as defense minister, the war against the guerrillas is being taken more seriously by many military officers who, under Garcia, were content to stay in the barracks. Unlike Garcia, however, the new Salvadoran military leader has no interest in human rights and agrarian reform issues. Military objectives have triumphed over the long-term goals of building democracy and promoting human rights.

Several administration critics discussed the concept of a US military intervention to create a "third force," a political center which could replace the extremes now in positions of great influence in El Salvador. This "liberal interventionist" option was proposed by Tom Farer in a recent article in Foreign Policy entitled "Managing the Revolution?" The question was raised of whether it would be desirable, or even possible, to use US troops in this way. Would the US public be any more likely to support military intervention in Central America in the pursuit of "democracy" than in the cause of "preventing another Cuba"?

Administration supporters argue that in time the military stalemate in El Salvador will benefit the government and the military by allowing the needed time for the recently established civic-action squads, which were designed to improve services and to benefit rural areas, to have an impact in areas previously out of the government's control. The training of the quick-reaction forces of Salvadorans in Honduras and the increasing military cooperation between the two countries will improve regional security and provide a better guarantee against Nicaraguan attempts at regional hegemony. Further, in the face of increasing threats to the region from Nicaragua, the Central American Defense Council, initiated in the early 1960s to prevent the spread of communism in Central America, is being revitalized.

Administration supporters also point out that the recent enactment of the Caribbean Basin Initiative Legislation will bring long-term economic benefits to the region. In the short term, large amounts of economic assistance will help the Central American counrties weather the current world recession which depresses the level of their export earnings from bananas, coffee, sugar, and other traditional export crops.

In one alternative policy discussion on El Salvador, it was agreed that the only way to defeat the extreme Left is by first defeating the extreme Right. Elements of the violent Left and Right must be isolated and removed from power before a peaceful settlement can be reached. Under one scenario, all the United States would have to do is to indicate that it would seriously like to pursue a course of negotiations with the leftist groups in El Salvador. This would by itself provoke a right-wing coup attempt. In turn, the United States would organize a countercoup and put more moderate politicians back in power. Then the negotiations could proceed with the FMLN/FDR groups which will also have shaken out the Marxist-Leninist extreme elements from the moderate political leaders like Ruben Zamora and Guillermo Ungo.

Some labeled this scenario overly simplistic. It was also pointed out that the Cuban-backed groups on the Left in El Salvador, especially the Popular Revolutionary Army (ERP) faction, are the strongest militarily and would tend to dominate the negotiations and their outcome in a fashion similar to the way the more extreme Marxist Tercerista faction in Nicaragua gained increasing control over the Sandinista movement.

One of the participants noted that if we are going to oppose the "thugs" in Managua we should have the same policy for the "thugs" in San Salvador. By ignoring the democratic Left, as represented by Ruben Zamora and Guillermo Ungo, we are ignoring our chance for a negotiated solution. One suggested policy option included US talks with Castro on reducing tensions in the region and the role of Cuban and US advisers in Central America.

It was suggested that some kind of power-sharing arrangement should be worked out between the FMLN/FDR and the Salvadoran government which would mean a restructing of the government and probably some kind of integration of the guerrila forces into the Salvadoran military.

Honduras

Several participants pointed out that in Honduras despair and hopelessness are even greater now than 20 years ago, when it was described as the country with the three 70s: 70 percent illiteracy, 70 percent malnutrition, and 70 percent premature mortality. In return for desperately needed aid, the Honduran government, under the increasing control of General Alvarez, has totally lent itself to the geopolitical purposes of the Reagan administration. The Honduran military is drawing its country closer to an open confrontation with Nicaragua at the same time that it is increasing the levels of domestic repression. Human rights violations are on the increase; labor and political leaders are disappearing only to turn up dead or in Cuba for training. In short, the country is headed down the path of El Salvador.

Honduras, for its part, is taking active steps to prevent the infiltration of arms from Nicaragua. US policy in other countries of the region, including Costa Rica and Panama, is directed toward shoring up their economies and helping them to overcome security problems caused by Nicaraguan and Cuban subversion.

CONSENSUS BUILDING

To be successful in the long term, US foreign policy objectives must be built on domestic consensus. Yet for the most part, US citizens are unaware of the events in Central America and are concerned that US troops may have to be sent to El Salvador to prevent a military collapse of that government. These fears are based primarily on the continuing trauma of Vietnam. Thus far, Congress and the administration have yet to develop a bipartisan approach to US foreign policy objectives in the region and the correct means to attain these objectives.

In general, many members of Congress are reluctant to take on the president in the area of foreign policy. In particular, they are not anxious to take too visible a stand against US policies in Central America, lest they be subsequently tarred with the brush of "losing Central America."

As one participant put it, it is difficult to build consensus when you certify, against all available evidence, that human rights are improving in El Salvador and that the reform programs are still in place. Another noted that most US citizens are "not buying the product" being sold by the administration—opinion polls taken after the president's address last spring on Central America did not reveal any significant new support for the administration's policies.

Compared to problems in the Middle East or to US-USSR relations, the issue of Central America does not now occupy center stage before the US public. The attention showered on the region by the administration, which argues that it should be viewed as the linchpin of the struggle between the superpowers, has confused and frightened many people. It has, moreover, failed to adequately explain what US stakes are in the region and under what circumstances US troops might have to be introduced.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The administration and Congress must work to establish a better dialogue on the nature and the origins of the problems in the region.

2. The United States must try to find a third option between the two extremes of the right-wing oligarchy and the pro-Soviet Left.

3. The United States should enter into serious negotiations with the FMLN/FDR in El Salvador and with the Sandinista government in Nicaragua to reduce tensions in the region and to try to find a peaceful settlement to the conflicts in Central America.

4. In its policies toward El Salvador, the United States must bring greater pressure to bear on that country to better protect human rights and to reinvigorate the agricultural-reform program. Reagan administration policy makers must give a higher priority to stopping the recent upsurge in kidnappings and murders by the right-wing death squads.

5. The United States should support more educational and cultural exchanges with the countries of Central America.

6. A key objective for U.S. policy in the region should be to counter Soviet and Cuban influence, but it should be pursued mainly by diplomatic and not military means.●

TRIBUTE TO ZACHARY P. GEANEAS

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity today to share with my colleagues the thoughts of my good friend, Mr. Zachary P. Geaneas. Mr. Geaneas recently retired from a long and distinguished career in the foreign service. He is a man of depth and spirit and great dedication. He served America in the most exemplary bway and throughout the years made many contributions to U.S. diplomatic initiatives and our pursuit of peace. In his article, Mr. Geaneas offers insight into the problems of one region of the world and recounts an affectingly personal experience in the politics of friendship. Mr. Geaneas' remarks follow:

DIPLOMACY AND FRIENDSHIP

(Zachary P. Geaneas, Counselor of Embassy, The United States of America, Retired)

Recent events in Cyprus have reopened the bloody and unhealed wounds that had been inflicted on that unfortunate island by Turkey. Their military occupation of Cypriot territory is a fait accompli and the international community is not able or is unwilling to take any overt action to rectify this illegal situation. As a result, Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots know full well that time is on their side and that most nations simply hope that the problems remain dormant or fade away. U.N. resolutions and pious statements by national and international leaders are a mere inconvenience that will soon pass into the anonymity of history. In the meantime, approximately 20,000 troops of the regular Turkish Army, many armed, equipped or trained with funds provided by the American taxpayer, are supporting an invalid regime that would collapse with the departure of the modern day Huns of Attila.

The above events caused me to recollect a situation that had produced a great deal of personal anguish. During 1979, I was the Counselor at the United States Mission to the United Nations (USUN) and the Secretary of the U.S. Delegation to the United Nations. Because of my prior service at the American Embassy in Athens from 1970 to 1975 and my subsequent assignment to the USUN, I was aware of the flow of events that were generated by the Cyprus situation. Being truly concerned by the lack of any progress, I wrote an article which was published in the Congressional Record at the request of Congressman Yatron of Pennsylvania. My paper pointed out that the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate could become an invaluable asset to the Turkish government and people. An enlightened and liberal policy would permit the restoration of Agia Sophia to its original splendor, the modernization and renovation of schools, hospitals and museums with funds contributed by the Orthodox faithful throughout the world. Constantinople would then become the center of an unprecedented tourist movement which would bring untold sums of money and waves of tourists to that historic city. The economy of Turkey would improve materially and relations between the Turks and the Greeks would be enhanced. Constantinople or Istanbul, as it is known today, would become a religious center similar to the Vatican and Mecca.

I reiterate that the article was an attempt to be helpful by proposing a concept that could be useful in helping to solve a dangerous and deteriorating situation. There was no intent to demean the Turkish government. At this time, I had a dear friend who occupied an important position in the Turkish Embassy in Washington. We had served previously in the Middle East and our friendship had grown over the years.

Because of my position at USUN, I frequently flew to Washington for consultation with the Department of State and often, I would visit my Turkish colleague at his Embassy. Shortly after my article had been published, I stopped by to see my Turkish friend at his office and was surprised by the cool reception that I received. The usual Turkish coffee was not offered to me. Instead, I was shown a copy of the Congressional Record, which included my article, and was chastised for writing and publishing my views. Somehow, in his opinion, I had breached the bonds of our friendship. I responded calmly to his accusations and pointed out that my writing was factual and that it proposed a possible course of action. I then challenged him to point out any errors or omissions that could be interpreted as being prejudicial or anti-Turkish.

I emphasized that both the contents and the intent of that particular paper were meant to ameliorate the condition that the Patriarchate found itself in and to better the relations between the two countries. Because of geography and history, Greece and Turkey would always be neighbors and I indicated that it was not necessary or desirable that they always be rivals or enemies.

As I was leaving, it was made crystal clear to me that I could no longer consider my Turkish colleage as a friend. It was also suggested that the Turkish Embassy would lodge a formal complaint with the Secretary of State because of my article. To the best of my knowledge, this threat was not carried out.

During my long diplomatic career, I have made many friends of diplomats of many nations. To this date, we keep in close touch and visit each others homes. Not infrequently, we differed and argued over the merits of the policies of our countries but we never permitted our differences to affect our friendships. I regret the loss of my Turkish friend and wonder if he was not acting under orders from his superiors who were sensitive about the ramifications of my proposal. I hope that my colleague was acting under orders because if this is so, some day, under a different international and political climate, we might be able to resume our friendship.●

MORE SUPPORT FOR ENTERPRISE ZONES

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, over the past 3½ years, I have worked with numerous individuals and organizations to form a coalition in support of the urban enterprise zone proposal. Recently, our colleague, Representative KEMP, had an opportunity to speak with columnist Carl Rowan about enterprise zones and those who support it. I would like to enter Mr. Rowan's column into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Tennessean, Nov. 23, 1983]

CONGRESSIONAL CONSENSUS ON AIDING NATION'S CITIES

(By Carl T. Rowan)

WASHINGTON.—Congresss slinked out of town for vacations to the jeers of people crying, "cowards!" "disgraceful!" and things unprintable.

A lot of Americans are fed up with the partisanship that has rendered the Congress impotent to deal with such critical things as the $200-billion-a-year budget deficits that could drag the country back toward economic disaster.

I visited Congress last week and found one reason for optimism: an almost unbelievable coming together of lawmakers to say that the government must act to give economic transfusions to sick inner cities.

Suddenly more than 230 members of the House are co-sponsors of the Enterprise Zone Employment and Development Act, which began with the unlikely sponsorship of Jack Kemp, the conservative Republican from Buffalo, N.Y., and Robert Garcia, the liberal Democrat from New York City.

At lunch with Kemp, I mentioned that while I have generally supported the concept of the government giving inducements to people to open businesses in urban areas of low income and high unemployment, I have been skeptical that the Congress or Americans with money to invest really gave a damn.

Kemp replied that "bridge-building" across racial and ideological lines is taking place, and that the plight of inner cities has become the focus. "On no other issue has a wider, more devoted, broad-based consensus emerged than on enterprise zones. Black, white and hispanic, liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans, mayors, suburban and rural areas all support this effort to help put our people to work in productive, meaningful jobs in our inner cities and other depressed areas."

We talked about the fact that only 18.3 percent of the black teen-agers hold jobs, and how this is a tragedy for all America.

"They have no jobs, and most of all they have no hope," he said. "People without hope decide that they'll just enjoy what they can for however long they live, and they often don't care whether it is legal or illegal, wise or unwise."

Which is why those colossal teenage unemployment figures get transformed into shocking statisticsabout delinquency, major crimes, drug abuse, births out of wedlock, welfare bill. . . .

Under the Kemp-Garcia plan, state governments will designate zones in which tax incentives will be offered for job creation and the growth of small businesses. Capital gains taxes on investment within zones would be eliminated. Additional investment tax credits would be allowed for investment within zones. To encourage the poor to take tax-paying jobs, workers would get personal income tax credits for wages earned in a zone. Employers would get special credit for hiring disadvantaged workers.

Kemp said that nine states with operating enterprise zones have created or saved 20,000 jobs. He points out, however, that no state can long sustain such a program unless the federal government joins in.

Most blacks in Congress started out leery of the idea, fearful it was a conservative scheme to wipe out urban development grants, food stamps or other assistance to poor people. They have been reassured by Kemp's assertion that "we have no hidden agenda."

Enterprise zones will not provide jobs for all those who are desperate for work opportunities. But it will make jobs available to many and thus give hope to almost all. And hope may be the most precious item at this time.●

DO NOT KILL THE PAY RAISE

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues an editorial entitled, "Congress and the Raise," which appeared in the January 31, 1984, edition of the Washington Post which is rightfully critical of recent action taken by our brethren in the other body to rescind the automatic pay raise for Members of Congress and Senators, which became effective January 1 of this year. The editorial points out.

If congressional salaries had kept pace with the average pay received in the private sector, a Senator or Representative would now be earning almost $95,000 a year, instead of the $72,000 Members began receiving this year.

Members of Congress and senior Federal executives have denied themselves cost-of-living adjustments totaling some $16,700 over the past 6 years through the imposition of pay caps. I do not believe that these restrictions are either necessary or appropriate. The U.S. Congress should not become a public institution filled only with millionaires, retirees, dilettantes, rogues, knaves, fools, thieves, and incompetents. Low salaries will assure this unfortunate result. We cannot return to the days of the 1860's when Members of Congress looked not to their salaries, but rather to pay which they received under the table for constituent service or for openly representing an assortment of special interests.

Both Members of Congress and Senators deserve the $2,400 salary increase which became effective January 1. It is important to the Nation that the salaries of Members of Congress and Senators are fixed at levels which attract the highest quality of persons to serve in the Congress of the United States.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 31, 1984]

CONGRESS AND THE RAISE

The Senate had barely gotten down to business last week when it voted to rescind the 3.5 percent pay raise that members of Congress received on the first of this month. As a sign of senatorial concern over mounting deficits, the lopsided 66-19 vote might be applauded. But as a practical matter, the gesture is misguided.

As Mike Causey pointed out in his column last Thursday, no one can accuse Congress of codding itself over the last decade. Congressional pay lagged somewhat behind federal civil service pay and, by a far larger margin, behind private-sector pay. If congressional salaries had kept pace with the average pay received in the private sector, a senator or representative would now be earning almost $95,000 a year instead of the $72,200 that members began receiving this year.

Serving in Congress has other compensations, of course. There's that heady sense of power; there are the attentions of a deferential staff; and, now and then, there is play in the press. Members of Congress also have a generous pension plan and other fringe benefits. Still, it's expensive to live in the capital city, and most of the lobbyists, lawyers, business executives and other grandees with whom congressmen routinely consort are pulling down salaries and other benefits far larger than those provided our elected representatives.

Being in Congress is also hard work, if you take your responsibilities at all seriously. And in recent years the level of frustration has mounted. That's partly why congressional turnover has been high, and why some promising political candidates are deciding they'd rather keep their state-level offices or stay in private business.

Ever shy about standing up and voting itself a raise, Congress has sought to reward itself in less obvious ways—putting into law "automatic" pay raises that never turn out that way, fiddling around with honorarium increases or, worse, generous tax deductions for extra living expenses. Back-door compensation increases of this sort are a bad idea because they either increase congressional vulnerability to special interests or reward those congressmen least in need of financial help.

The Senate has done the House a bad turn by voting piously to roll back the pay raise and leaving the final word to the House. But the House should resist the obvious pressure. Congress needs to vote itself regular pay increases just as long as these don't get out of line with how the public is faring on average.●

STATEMENT ON 1985 BUDGET CUTS AFFECTING WOMEN AND CHILDREN

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, the poor are taking it on the chin in President Reagan's proposed 1985 budget.

And that means that women and children are being hit the hardest.

Once again the Republican administration is showing its insensitivity to women and the special difficulties that women and single mothers face today.

Twelve million American children live in households run by single mothers. About half of those families are poor.

In Massachusetts, single mothers head 134,800 households. Of those families, 56,770 are poor. There are 140,280 children living in poverty in those homes.

Since 1979, more than 3 million young American boys and girls have become a sad statistic: They have joined the ranks of those living in poverty.

And now, President Reagan and his counselors—those who say that hunger cannot be documented in the United States—propose a net cut of nearly $5 billion in domestic spending in 1985. About 40 percent of those cuts are in programs for the poor.

That means that Federal spending for food and nutrition aid for women, infants, and children would be cut by $600 million.

That means that money for food stamps would be slashed by $374 million.

That means that funding for aid to families with dependent children would drop by more than $600 million and spending for medicaid would be cut by $1.1 billion.

Altogether, spending for programs that help the poor—those who have suffered from the high inflation and the high unemployment rates of the past few years—would be cut by 5 percent between now and 1989.

We who care about women trying to juggle jobs, run a household, and raise a family, we who care about children and the promise they represent for the future of our country, can hardly stand by and watch the current administration wreak havoc with their lives.

I already have signed a letter urging the President to reconsider his plans to cut funding for aid to families with dependent children.

We must do more to help those who need it most.

The fight for the future of our country has just begun.●

DEATH OF A CHAMP

HON. TIM VALENTINE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

● Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, William E. (Champ) Batchelor was buried in the family plot in the cemetery in our hometown of Nashville, Nash County, N.C., at 3:30 p.m. on Monday, January 30, 1984. He was 57 years of age.

No one seems to know how, when, or where this good man acquired the nickname or title of "Champ" or those who know are not telling. He was no prizefighter or star athlete or bridge player or business baron. Maybe they began to call him Champ because of some sandlot baseball feat in a long past boyhood or because, as a child, he swam longer or dove deeper or just simply spent more time than anyone else in that old swimming hole we called, for some forgotten reason, "Sally Ann" on Stoney Creek near Evans Mill. The leapfrogging years have obscured the event or contest or special achievement, but so what—the name "Champ" lived with him and he carried it well with drollness and good humor. He was a Champ with people, a true lover of folks, with a gentle, sensitive nature.

With this Champ, I shared many childhood escapades and adult experiences.

He was a man bubbling with words, as befits the fine auctioneer that he was—a man of enthusiasm and raw, salty, uninhibited mirth. He was a champion of charm, with a grace all his own. His passing left a void in the life of Kitty, his wonderful, adoring and patient wife, and in the lives of his fine daughters, Lorraine and Julia, and his sisters, and other kin. His passing left a void in the lives of his many, many friends.

His death left me with an empty feeling of profound, irreparable loss.

The "Champ" of good cheer, of sunshine, of people, words and laughter, is down but not out of our hearts and minds.

So long dear, loyal friend.●

COMMENDING AARP SUPPORT FOR NURSING HOME REFORM

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to commend the recent efforts by the American Association of Retired Persons in support of the National Coalition for Nursing Home Reform. Under the able leadership of its executive director, Cy Brickfield, AARP has worked hard these past years to protect the interests of the elderly. In order to insure that the elderly receive good quality nursing home care, this Nation faces very difficult challenges and requires assistance from many groups.

The most current example of this type of assistance is the recently released "Consumer Statement of Principles for the Nursing Home Regulatory System—State Licensure and Federal Certification Programs." This valuable report provides tools for Federal and State Government efforts to insure a high standard of care in our Nation's nursing homes. For their work on this report and for many other instances of support for the elderly, I want to express my appreciation to the American Association of Retired Persons.●

THE TARGETED JOBS TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

HON. MIKE LOWRY

OF WASHINGTON

● Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation, for myself and Mr. DICKS, which will resolve a problem that has arisen in the administration of an extremely important program—the targeted jobs tax credit program. At present, an employer must request or receive a certification for the TJTC program on or before the first day of employment of an individual for whom certification is sought. My bill will extend this period of time from the first to the fifth day of an individual's employment.

In Washington State, the "first day" language which exists in current law is inhibiting the processing of eligible individuals whose employers miss the 1-day deadline as well as those individuals who are hired and start work on the same or consecutive days. This extremely short deadline is no doubt causing problems in other States and jurisdictions. The institution of a 5-day period for requesting or receiving certification under the TJTC program will allow more effective implementation of this much-needed program.

I urge my colleagues to work with me for the passage of this legislation during the reauthorization of the Targeted Jobs Tax Credit Act later this year. Thank you.●

CONDEMNATION OF THE TURKISH GOVERNMENT

HON. WILLIAM R. RATCHFORD

OF CONNECTICUT

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, the latest attempt by members of the Turkish Cypriot community to destroy the unity and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus has been condemned by the community of nations. The declaration of an independent state in the northern part of Cyrpus has been denounced by a great many nations as a violation of existing treaty obligations entered into in 1960, as well as the international legal order.

I joined with many of my colleagues in November in condemning the actions of the Turkish Cypriots, and the Turkish Government for its part in recognizing the so-called new government. It has become evident, however, that stronger action is needed if we are to succeed in convincing Turkey that it must revoke its recognition of the secession and begin to support the efforts of the U.N. initiative on Cyprus. It is time to use more of our leverage. I urge my colleagues to support efforts to prohibit all U.S. military assistance to Turkey until the Turkish Government shows serious commitment to resolving the conflict. It is simply wrong for American dollars to contribute to the maintenance of Turkish occupation troops. The United States must not stand idly by and allow this injustice to continue.●

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO PROHIBIT OIL IMPORTS FROM IRAN

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation that will prohibit oil imports into this country from Iran.

Despite the humiliation of the Iranian hostage crisis and the deaths of hundreds of Americans in Beirut at the hands of terrorists with close links to Iran, the United States continues to import significant amounts of crude oil from that country. Figures provided by the Energy Information Administration indicate that the United States directly imported almost 22 million barrels of crude oil from Iran in 1983 with a value of well over $600 million. These figures do not even include Iranian oil imported indirectly through the Caribbean and West European nations.

I strongly believe America should not be in the business of supporting in any way the spread of terrorism and fanaticism and should take steps to isolate the threat posed by the Khomeini regime. Oil revenues are the lifeblood of Iran's terrorist crusade. Whether in Lebanon or elsewhere in the Middle East, moderate Arab states continue to look to the United States for support against Moslem extremism. We can send these countries a strong signal that we will not associate with radical regimes that rely on cowardly terrorist acts to further their cause.

Appropriately, the administration has officially reclassified Iran, along with Syria, Cuba, South Yemen, and Libya, as an exporter of terrorism, thereby tightening the restrictions on what the United States may export to Iran. The Congress must do its part by mandating an end to oil imports from Iran. The deaths of our Embassy personnel, our marines, and most recently, a university president, demand no less.●

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION IN SUPPORT OF HOUSING AND THE CONTINUATION OF BUILDER BONDS

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce a resolution with my colleague from Arizona (Mr. McCain) to preserve the current tax treatment of mortgage-backed builder bond transactions to help homebuilders help themselves and provide affordable financing for American home buyers.

Builder bonds have become a significant new source of funds for residential mortgages generating benefits for both the consumer and the housing industry. For thousands of middle-income families, it has meant the difference between dreaming about homeownership and realizing that dream. Builder bonds have also proven themselves to be a valuable countercyclcial economic tool because in times of high interest rates, when more conventional financing dries up, builders are able to reduce mortgage rates and stay in business.

Large builders have used these bonds for several years. Now they are available to medium and small builders through new multibuilder bond companies.

In simple terms, builder bonds are sold to the public which are collateralized by mortgages made to home buyers. Under existing provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, builders are not taxed when they borrow money through issuance of bonds, but rather are taxed as the underlying collateral mortgages are paid off.

Upon issuing bonds, the builder does not immediately "cash out" of the mortgages but rather leaves a substantial amount of income yet to be realized through repayment of the mortgages in the future. Builders are able to sustain builder bond programs by the deferral of taxes through the long-recognized installment sale method of reporting income. This allows the builder to pay taxes as liquidity is regained from the repayment of the mortgages.

This tax treatment is consistent with tax principles of over 50 years standing and approved by rulings issued by the Internal Revenue Service.

However, the administration is now mounting an attack on builder bonds and Secretary Regan is considering proposals to deny the installment sale method of accounting for builder bonds and make other revisions in the builder bond program. This would be devastating to the homebuilding industry and to the home buying public without significantly increasing the overall revenues to the Federal Government.

Our resolution expresses the sense of Congress that it is opposed to any legislative or administrative action that would alter the way in which builder bond transactions are currently taxed.

The housing industry has just struggled through the toughest and most painful time since the Great Depression—without Government help. Builders across the country have stayed afloat through their own initiative, the sweat of their brow, and innovative forms of finance such as builder bonds. Today, they help drive the engine of economic recovery by generating 1,700 jobs for every 1,000 housing units built and bringing revenue back to the Treasury.

At a time when Government housing policies are on the retreat, builder bonds demonstrate the ability of the private sector to respond to the housing needs of the Nation without Government subsidy. This is especially important as the Nation tries to house the postwar baby boom generation. Failure to fulfill this need will not only put upward pressure on home prices, fueling inflation, but could also have important social costs.

These are just some of the reasons why I urge my colleagues to cosponsor our resolution and voice your support for the continuation of builder bonds.

Housing indicators are up. Finally, thousands of American families and thousands employed in housing- and timber-related industries have reason to expect a brighter tomorrow. Now is not the time to dash their hopes and jeopardize a sustained housing recovery.●

TRIBUTE TO MR. FRANK J. ZUCHOWSKE

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, recently, my district lost one of its most admired and respected citizens, Mr. Frank J. Zuchowski. Frank Zuchowski contributed so much to this community all of his adult life. He served as mayor of Rossford, Ohio, for 14 years—a tenure that was marked by great accomplishment and dignity. For 43 years, Frank Zuchowski was an exemplary employee of Libbey-Owens-Ford Co.—doing his part to build the economy of our area.

Beyond his distinguished public service as mayor, Frank Zuchowski actively participated in a host of civic and fraternal organizations including: the Wood County Democratic Executive Committee for 50 years; the Polish National Alliance for 40 years, Knights of Columbus, Glass Workers Union Local 9, and Holy Cross Council. Frank Zuchowski will be missed by all those who had the privilege of knowing him.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives join me in offering our condolences to his lovely wife Alfreda and his large and loving family. On behalf of all the people in the Ninth District, I say thank you to the Zuchowski family for sharing this special person with us.●

NATIONAL SALUTE TO HOSPITALIZED VETERANS

HON. G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, during the week of February 14, the Veterans Administration will sponsor a nationwide effort paying special tribute to the more than 1 million veterans who enter VA medical facilities for medical attention each year.

Although Veterans Day is the traditional day when all American veterans are remembered, the Veterans Administration plans special activities for the patients in its medical facilities during a week-long tribute each year. These activities are in recognition of the particular challenges which these men and women, often far from family and friends for extended periods of time, face during their hospitalization.

This salute will also provide a unique opportunity for individuals and organizations to visit VA medical facilities and discover the professional excellence of the Nation's No. 1 health care delivery system.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues and the public to join in this salute by visiting our hospitalized veterans to show that we care and that we appreciate the personal sacrifices they have made and, in many instances, continue to make in our behalf. Anyone wishing to participate may simply contact the nearest Veterans' Administration medical facility.

All it takes is a friendly smile, a handshake, or a brief chat. Nothing hurts like being forgotten * * * nothing helps like being remembered.●

LEGISLATION TO CONTINUE MORTGAGE REVENUE BONDS

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to continue to allow mortgage revenue bonds to be issued.

This worthy program makes housing affordable for millions of Americans who would not otherwise be able to achieve "the American dream." Last session, extension of the program had the support of substantial majorities of both the House and the Senate. Yet, due to the controversies over another provision of the same bill, this program expired on December 31, 1983.

The refusal of the House of Representatives to consider H.R. 4170, the so-called Tax Reform Act of 1983, in no way connoted disapproval of the popular mortgage bond program. In fact, the program's immense popularity was a hostage for the leadership's push for sweeping, controversial changes to other programs.

The mortgage bond program must not be allowed to die as a result of the controversies over another, separate program. And if those controversies are to be settled legitimately, they should be brought to the House floor and debated fairly, openly and on their own merits. They should not be used as the ransom for extending the mortgage bond program that serves lower income persons so well.

For these and other reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am introducing an individual bill to extend the mortgage bond program on its own merits. I urge the Members to push for enactment of this legislation which means so much to their constituents.●

A TRIBUTE TO EMIDIO CACCIABEVE

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, on January 28, the friends, family, and colleagues of Emidio Cacciabeve will join together to celebrate and commemorate the retirement of this fine citizen of New Jersey. Mr. Cacciabeve has served the citizens of Boonton since 1958 as mayor, alderman and board president, as well as chairman of important police, health, fire, and finance committees.

His many fine accomplishments and tireless work are motivation for us all. His keen leadership and wise judgement have resulted in an excellent municipal government worthy of special recognition.

The people of Boonton have certainly benefited from the dedication and devotion of this fine man. He truly deserves to be commended, and together with my colleagues, Emidio's family, friends, and associates, I would like to wish him all the best in his future endeavors. He is loved by many and appreciated for his contribution to the community.●

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, Scouting Anniversary Week will be celebrated nationally February 5 to 11, with the theme "Catch the Scouting Spirit." The week-long observance is dedicated to the untiring efforts of the volunteers who have been the foundation of the Boy Scouts of America.

Membership in the Boy Scouts of America is increasing as the organization continues to expand its horizons and reach out to persons not specifically pinpointed before: Handicapped youth; innercity youth; 7-year-old boys through the Tiger Cub program; 14- to 18-year-old boys through Varsity Scouting; "latch-key" children through "Prepared for Today" material; and teenage females in the Explorers.

Times may have changed, but the principles of the Boy Scouts of America remain the same: Developing character, responsible citizenship, and personal fitness. Volunteers have served as role models for the young people and have played a vital part in the success of Boy Scouts of America since its inception in 1910.

Scouting is continuing to grow and expand in my home State of Kentucky. The membership of the Four Rivers Council, which includes the Second District which I have the privilege to represent in Congress, increased again in 1983 along with the number of Scouting units. In addition, 1983 saw 18 Scouts achieve the rank of Eagle Scout.

The Four Rivers Council is developing a high adventure program at Camp Manchester and hopes to have it available to all youth groups next fall. In 1984 the council will emphasize developing programs and organizing units to service special youth with mental or physical handicaps.

At this time I join with the members of Boy Scouts of America in honoring their volunteers and I want to commend the Scouts and their volunteers for their past achievements and wish them continued success in the future.●

WESTINGHOUSE WINNERS

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

Monday, February 6, 1984

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor to bring to the attention of my colleagues the notable achievements of two exceptional students from New York's Fourth Congressional District who have been selected from over 1,056 entries as finalists in the 43d annual Westinghouse Science Talent Search. Sun Hye Yang, of Baldwin, and Ken Chang Lin, of Plainview, have been invited to Washington, D.C., to compete for the Westinghouse Science Scholarships and Awards in March.

Sun Hye Yang, a senior at Baldwin High School, selected a chemistry project for her entry: a study of the relationship between the rate of oxidation band migration and reactant concentration in an oscillating chemical system. A winner of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute Math and Science Award and the Dakin Memorial Award from the chemistry department of Adelphi University, Sun plans to enroll at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to study electrical engineering and computer science. Sun, born in Korea, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chang Joo Yang.

Ken Chang Lin, a senior at Plainview-Old Bethpage High School, won for his research on the egg depositing behavior of the onion fly. He conducted the experiments while attending the high school honors science program at Michigan State University during this past summer.

Ken has also earned recognition in the field of mathematics, winning several awards for his achievements, including the Nassau County Junior Mathletes High Scoring Achievement Award and a gold medal at the Long Island Math Fair held at Hofstra University. Ken plans to attend Stanford University to pursue his talents in the fields of biomedical engineering or medicine. Born in Taiwan, he is the son of Dr. and Mrs. Chi-Yung Lin.

I congratulate Sun Hye Yang and Ken Chang Lin on their scholastic achievements. In man's quest to learn more about the world around him, great advances have been made in science and technology. With young students like Sun and Ken, we can be assured that the quest for knowledge will continue and will help bring further advances.

Their example serves as an inspiration to every young person.

Sun and Ken will now go on to compete for 1 of the 10 Westinghouse scholarships to the college of their choice. As their Representative in the U.S. Congress, I wish them every success in their future endeavors.●

LEGISLATION TO ALLOW A DEDUCTION FROM INCOME FOR SEWER SERVICES

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, on January 24, I introduced with my colleague from Massachusetts, BARNEY FRANK, H.R. 4622, legislation which would allow taxpayers to deduct sewer user fees from Federal taxes. I hope that you will join us as a cosponsor of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, section 164 of the Internal Revenue Code allows taxpayers to claim as an itemized deduction certain taxes, including State and local personal and real property taxes. No provision is made, however, for deductions of certain user fees from which the user derives any tangible benefit. The Internal Revenue Service explains that a tax is an enforced contribution, enacted pursuant to legislative authority in the exercise of taxing power, and imposed and collected for the purpose of raising revenue to be used for public or governmental purposes. It is not enacted as a payment for some special privilege granted or service rendered. Thus, under the Internal Revenue Code, a user fee is not a tax and thus is not deductible.

Mr. FRANK and I believe, however, that citizens who pay a user fee for sewer service should be able to deduct that fee from Federal income taxes. In many cases, for a city to obtain a Federal sewer grant, they must impose a user fee on the citizens hooked into the sewer system. It seems only fair that if the Federal Government is requiring a user fee that it should be allowed as a deduction. Many individuals cannot afford large increases in user fees, nor can they afford the basic fees themselves.

As a matter of equity, Mr. Speaker, we believe that our legislation—which would simply create an additional deduction in Code section 164—should be enacted. Mr. FRANK and I urge the Committee on Ways and Means to act on this legislation quickly, and urge our colleagues to cosponsor H.R. 4622.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, February 7, 1984

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

His Excellency, Archbishop Iakovos, primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, New York, N.Y., offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit now and ever unto the ages of ages. Amen.

In Your presence, a Triune God, we are searching our minds and souls as we are about to begin another day of sessions, meetings, study, and understanding of the day's problems and work.

In deep humility, we ask for Your assistance, illumination, wisdom, and strength so that we may arrive at decisions and resolutions that would respond to the needs of our country and citizens and would alleviate the heaviness of the mind and of the heart as we proceed in finding answers for them.

We are cognizant of the enormity and perplexity of the question of peace that we so painfully pursue through our daily deliberations and businesses. We are fully aware of the tremendous responsibility to meet the demands of our office and of particular tasks that we fail not, neither us or others.

We beseech You to dissipate, through the illuminations of our minds, confession, awareness, and doubt that darken the horizon within and without us, so that we may, with a totally persuaded heart, tread toward the fulfillment of Your divine will. This we ask in deep faith, truth, and reverence. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 290) entitled "Joint resolution to permit free entry into the United States of the personal effects, equipment, and other related articles of foreign participants, officials, and other accredited members of delegations involved in the games of the XXIII Olympiad to be held in the United States in 1984."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 215. An act to amend the Bail Reform Act of 1966 to permit consideration of danger to the community in setting pretrial release conditions, to expand the list of statutory release conditions, to establish a more appropriate basis for deciding on postconviction release and for other purposes;

S. 668. An act to reform Federal criminal sentencing procedures; and

S. 948. An act to reform Federal criminal and civil forfeiture.

HIS EMINENCE ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS

(Mr. YATRON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, Archbishp Iakovos has been the leader of his spiritual flock for 25 years. As primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, he has been in the forefront of every humane effort to rid life of its evil contradictions and to insure a better existence not only for his own people, but for all the American people.

His appearence here to open today's House session with prayer coincides with his 25-year stewardship of his church and a recognition of his efforts by the faithful of his archdiocese.

It is my honor to express solicitations and respect to Archbishop Iakovos and to wish him in the tradition of the church many years of continued fruitful service to God and to all his people.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YATRON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I, too, want to add my personal gratitude to His Eminence for gracing us with the invocation to begin today's session.

The 25 years in which he has served as the chieftain of the Orthodox Church of North and South America, those 25 years have coincided with the greatest period of growth and interblending of the Greek Orthodox Church with life in the United States. I give him a personal expression of gratitude for that alone, in the words of our faith, the Greek Orthodox faith, I also wish to take this opportunity to say eis polla eti, thespota, many more years, Your Eminence, in the service of our faith.

Doeh as president and sole shareholder of the Morovis Development Corporation (a corporation incorporated under the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico) in connection with the late completion by such corporation of the houses comprising the Russe Development in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the purchase of which houses was financed by the Farmers Home Administration. Such losses consisted of—

(1) that part of the purchase price withheld at the direction of the Farmers Home Administration for the late completion of certain Russe Development houses, even though such lateness was contractually excusable, being directly attributable to unusually heavy rainfalls, unexpected work stoppages, and other uncontrollable circumstances; and

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Olga Rojas-Pujolar may be issued a visa and admitted to the United States for permanent residence if she is found to be otherwise admissible under the provisions of such Act: Provided, That this exemption shall apply only to a ground for exclusion of which the Department of State or the Department of Justice had knowledge prior to the enactment of this Act: Provided further, That a suitable and proper bond or undertaking, approved by the Attorney General, be deposited as prescribed by section 213 of such Act.

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1867, private legislation I introduced for the relief of Olga Rojas-Pujolar.

Miss Pujolar has been diagnosed as suffering from a schizophrenic disorder for the last 31 years. Up until 1980, she lived with her family in Cuba and later in Spain. Although devoted to her, when the last of her family fled Cuba and was allowed to enter the United States in 1980, she was denied admittance and the family was forced to place her in a mental hospital in Madrid.

Since that time, Mr. and Mrs. Charles White, the brother-in-law and sister of Miss Pujolar, have done everything possible to get a waiver of excludability so that Miss Pujolar could join them here in the United States. They have continued to support her financially, at a cost of more than $20,000 to date and have engaged a local doctor to help in caring for their sister once she comes to America. They have agreed to post a bond in her behalf and in the 97th Congress, at Chairman MAZZOLI's request, they added a codicil to their will establishing a trust fund for the care of Miss Pujolar, should they predecease her. In essence, they are willing to do anything reasonably necessary to insure their continued devotion and support for Miss Pujolar. I truly believe they are sincere in their efforts.

Miss Pujolar is 61 years old. For the last 4 years she has been, except for an occasional visit from her mother and sister, virtually alone in Madrid, with no family members to look in on her. Her doctor indicated that Miss Pujolar had shown notable improvement. He also stated that further institutional care could do more harm than good and that what she really needed was the care, attention, and affection of her family.

Since August of 1983, in accordance with a new Spanish Government policy, Miss Pujolar has been transferred from the hospital to a "casa de reposo" (rest home). While the accommodations are satisfactory, the necessity for this bill still exists—that is to reunite a family and to see that an invalid with a mental disease receives the love and comfort of her family in her later years of life.

The White family continues to do everything they can to assure my colleagues of their willingness to care for their sister, both physically and financially. They love their sister and want her home with them. This is a unique situation calling for a unique remedy and I hope you will agree and support this legislation.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NERY DE MAIO

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 1865), for the relief of Nery De Maio.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 1865

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Nery De Maio—

(1) shall be held and considered to have satisfied the requirements of—

(A) section 312(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1423(2)), relating to a knowledge and understanding of the fundamentals of the history, and of the principles and form of government, of the United States, and

(B) section 337(a) of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1448(a)), relating to the taking of an oath of allegiance to the United States, and

(2) notwithstanding section 310(d) of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1421(d)), may be naturalized at any time after the date of the enactment of this Act if she is otherwise eligible for naturalization under such Act (8 U.S.C. 1101 et seq.).

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1865, private legislation I introduced for the relief of Nery De Maio.

Mrs. Nery De Maio is the 63-year-old wife of my constituent, 93-year-old

William De Maio. A native of Colombia and permanent resident who has lived in the United States for more than 22 years, she suffered a stroke 12 years ago, just before she was to take her citizenship examination. As a result, she suffers from a permanent condition known as aphasia, a language breakdown which left her unable to communicate, to any degree, by written or spoken word.

As a result, Mrs. De Maio has been unable to meet two of the requirements for naturalization—demonstrating through an examination her knowledge and understanding of our Nation's history and Government fundamentals, and taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. H.R. 1865 establishes that Mrs. De Maio has satisfied these two requirements, which her aphasia handicap has thus far prevented, and allows her to complete the process of naturalization.

Although much of her life since her stroke has been devoted to overcoming her disability, she has not given up her dream of becoming an American citizen. I became involved in Mrs. De Maio's fight for citizenship in September 1979, and have been trying to help her ever since. Her last hope was crushed on April 13, 1982, when a Tampa Federal judge regretfully denied her petition for naturalization in what he described as one of the most difficult, and heartrending, decisions that the court has been called upon to make. In his decision, however, he added that he hoped Mrs. De Maio might find in Congress the relief she seeks. It was with that hope in mind that I introduced this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I support the current naturalization requirements for immigrants wishing to become U.S. citizens. However, I also support granting a special exception for Mrs. De Maio. This is not a case of someone who cannot or simply will not meet the naturalization requirements. This is the case of an intelligent women who has been stricken with an unfortunate medical occurrence entirely beyond her control. To deny her the citizenship she so desperately wants would be to perpetuate an injustice. I urge my colleagues to right this wrong by supporting H.R. 1865.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MILITARY COMMISSARIES, A SUBSIDY TO U.S. MILITARY PERSONNEL

(Mr. NICHOLS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, on January 10, the Washington Post carried an article entitled "Grace Panel Finds Pork Barrel Overflowing." It was followed by an editorial on January 11 relating to that portion of the Grace report concerning military commissaries.

Congressman DAN DANIEL, who serves as chairman of the Readiness Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee, responded to both the article and the editorial with appropriate letters to which the Washington Post apparently elected not to respond. Mr. DANIEL called to their attention errors in both articles. Specifically, he mentioned the allegations that the commissaries generate profits and that the military commissaries serve as a subsidy to those serving in the U.S. military. The fact of the matter is that the use of the commissaries is a privilege granted to those men and women who serve in the Armed Forces as a part of their overall compensation. Despite the position taken by the Washington Post I do not believe that this Congress will wish to abolish this longtime tradition promised to our soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines as part of their pay for service to their country.

Mr. Speaker, I would include the letters from Mr. DANIEL addressed to the Washington Post intended to correct these misconceptions:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 10, 1984.

EDITOR,
The Washington Post, Washington, D.C.

I have just completed reading the article on Page A-3 of the January 10 Washington Post titled "Grace Panel Finds Pork Barrel Overflowing," and feel compelled to comment on that portion which deals with military commissaries.

For the record, I am Chairman of the Panel on Morale, Welfare and Recreation of the House Armed Services Committee. I have no military bases in my District, and so far as I know there are no suppliers to commissaries based there. This would seem to place commissaries outside the "pork barrel" category in my case.

The information in the article is basically correct, but it is irrelevant. Commissaries exist to provide a buying advantage to the men and women who serve in the armed forces. It is a form of non-cash compensation, and if commissaries were abolished, taxpayers would need to provide in military pay $350 million more than the commissary subsidy to make up the difference in disposable income just for the United States alone.

I should point out, too, that commissaries exist in high-density locations because these are also high-cost locations.

As long as we have to go into the labor market to recruit the men and women who serve in the military, we will have to compensate them in cash or in some other ways; it is a condition of employment they have been promised.

Very sincerely,

DAN DANIEL.

JANUARY 11, 1984.

EDITOR,
The Washington Post, Washington, D.C.

Your editorial of January 11 has not gone unnoticed. It cannot go unchallenged.

The piece contains one error in fact, one error in interpretation, and one large oversight.

The fact is commissaries do not generate profits. Products are sold at cost, plus a surcharge of five percent to cover maintenance and replacement of commissary facilities. Proposals for new commissaries, I might add, must be approved by the Panel which I chair. The number of new commissaries in the United States has been capped.

The interpretation which is in error is that the appropriation for commissaries is a "subsidy." It is not. It is a part of the compensation to the men and women who serve in the armed forces and to a lesser extent those who have earlier served and retired. In short, it is a fulfillment of a condition of employment. To look with disfavor on the fact that these people also feed their families the food which was purchased in a commissary seems inordinately meanminded, especially from one who is so concerned about the nutrition of those on limited incomes.

And finally, the oversight concerns the use of military facilities by the homeless. Had your paper not been so bent on reporting about outlays for weapons systems, they might have noticed that in the FY 1984 Defense Authorization Bill, $10 million was added, at my instigation, to provide utilities and other services at military facilities which will be made available to the homeless, so long as this does not interfere with readiness.

Get it right, Mr. Editor!

Very sincerely,

DAN DANIEL.

IN HONOR OF HIS EMINENCE ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, there are few times in this body when we are so honored as we are today to be joined by a man of spiritual and human qualities as His Eminence Archbishop Iakovos, leader of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America. I am honored to join with my colleagues in welcoming here today.

It is especially fitting that we pay tribute to him for he has recently achieved a milestone in his career—that being 25-years as a priest in the Greek Orthodox Church. In his 25-year career, Archbishop Iakovos has championed countless causes on behalf of human and civil rights for all people—of all religions and races. To demonstrate his dedication to this cause he has traveled the world: From New Delhi, to Vietnam, to Jerusalem. He has been an ecumenical giant—fostering dialog with other religions—Roman Catholics, Anglicans, Lutherans, and Southern Baptists.

His dedication to human and civil rights in this country and throughout the world are well known to those of us who have joined with him in support of the cause of Cyprus—which was illegally invaded by Turkey in 1974 and continues to brutally repress the Greek Cypriot population there.

Archbishop Iakovos also joined with the late Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King in 1965 in the historic civil rights march in Selma, Ala. He has never shied from controversy—he has never walked away from a just and noble cause. He has never waivered in his desire to speak out against religious repression and violations of human rights—wherever they occur.

In addition to his commitment to the eradication of repression of the human mind and spirit—His Eminence is a man of compassion and of devotion to God. I know first-hand of his leadership for I was honored to have been the representative of Astoria, N.Y., where there are probably more Greeks than in Athens, up until 1982. I have joined with him on many occasions on matters of mutual concern and interest. I know him to be a leader among men and men—as well as a devoted and dedicated servant of God.

It is a great pleasure and honor to welcome him to Washington today.

THE RETIREMENT OF BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

(Mr. DUNCAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I was sad yesterday when BARBER CONABLE announced he would not be back in the next Congress.

I came to Congress with BARBER CONABLE 19 years ago and I have been by his side on the Ways and Means Committee for the past 13 years.

BARBER is one of the warmest and most human persons I have ever known. He is my friend and I cherish the time that we have shared together.

Few men in history have had the brilliance, the courage and the achievement of BARBER CONABLE. He has served his district and country well.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure at a later date that a special order will be before this House where our colleagues can further honor BARBER CONABLE.

THE FORMATION OF CLUBB

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, 32 of the 34 States required to convene a constitutional convention on behalf of a balanced budget tax limitation amendment, have already done so. Seven more are undergoing a grassroots effort to add them to the list.

Seventy percent of the American public aware of this effort support it. But when this Congress was given the chance to pass the amendment to the States for ratification in 1982, they failed to do so.

Today, I am announcing the formation of CLUBB. It stands for "Congressional Leaders United for a Balanced Budget." CLUBB is not just another caucus. CLUBB is not designed to recruit bill cosponsors or discharge consideration of balanced budget legislation. CLUBB is not designed to rewrite legislation. What CLUBB is, is a coalition of bipartisan Members of Congress from both sides of the Hill, that believe we need to enact the balanced budget/tax limitation amendment to the U.S. Constitution and are willing to go outside the bounds of Congress to do it.

Article V of the Constitution provides the people, through their State legislatures, the means to force this Congress to act. And while most of us have heard the campaign of misinformation regarding the runaway constitutional convention we have been unable to do anything to further the cause of truth. Now we can, through CLUBB.

Your offices received a "Dear Colleague" from me this week regarding CLUBB. I urge you to give it your consideration if, like me, you believe in a balanced Federal budget and limited spending.

IN HONOR OF ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS

(Mr. BILIRAKIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, we are indeed honored and privileged, Mr. Speaker, to have had the invocation delivered today by His Eminence, Archbishop Iakovos, spiritual leader of the Greek Orthodox faithful in the Western Hemisphere. As he honors us today with his very presence and prayers, we, likewise, honor him as he celebrates his 50th anniversary as a clergyman of the Orthodox faith and his 25th year as archbishop of the New World. It is this courageous man who took an ethnic church and wove it into the mainstream of society. He was the driving force that established Orthodoxy as a major faith in America, as he broke the traditional barriers that existed for years.

Though he is a man of many gifts and talents, as is evident in the countless honors and awards that have been bestowed upon him, including the Presidential Medal of Freedom, deep inside he is a simple shepherd who tends the flock that has been given to him and he remains true to his mission of serving both God and man.

As a Greek Orthodox myself, I am proud that the U.S. Congress has honored Archbishop Iakovos today, and in behalf of the people of the ninth Congressional District of Florida, where he is well known and loved, I wish him continued strength and success in his pastoral work.

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH A COMMISSION ON NEUROFIBROMATOSIS

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 6751, a bill to establish a Commission on Neurofibromatosis. Many do not recognize this disease by its proper name, but I am confident that almost every Member of this body knows of an individual who suffers under its impact. It's nickname is familiar to many, although those plagued with the disease seldom refer to it in this way because it draws upon frightening images, its common name is elephant man's disease. I became more familiar with this disease through the bright eyes and smiling face of adorable 1½-year-old Kacie Grady. Kacie, daughter of Jim and Sandy Grady of Fort Lauderdale, Fla. is a victim of N.F., fortunately her twin sister Kerrie is not. Mr. Speaker, as the very proud father of four children, I, like every other parent, worried through the normal childhood diseases, such as mumps and measles. Although we all know that it is absolutely that a child suffer through a bout of chicken pox, as parents we tend to breath a sigh of relief when the sickness subsidies and the child resumes his/her normal activities. Parents of children afflicted with N.F. never experience the sigh of relief that comes with the knowledge that the childhood sickness has run its course. Some who suffer N.F. are more fortunate than others for their symptoms may not be readily visible. However, this can change over time and as Sandy Grady will tell you, not knowing what will happen in the future to your child really hurts. Sandy candidly admits that about all that she can do is to pray that her daughter only have a mild case. I can tell you that Sandy Grady has done much more for her daughter and for all other children afflicted by the disease than to sit back and simply hope that her prayers will be answered. She and her husband have channeled their combined energies into educating others about the illness. The Gradys, as part of the Florida Chapter of the National Neurofibromatosis Foundation have really taken the bull by the horns. They found that educating the public is the first hurdle to overcome. The lack of information available to the general public about N.F. contributes to the fear of the disease and the social isolation of its victims. Those who have family members suffering from N.F. know that while educating the general public is important, educating the medical community to recognize the disease is far more important.

Mr. Speaker, there is an important role that each Member of this body can play in this educational process. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 6751, an important bill to establish a Commission on Neurofibromatosis.

THE MIDDLE EAST SITUATION

(Mr. PAUL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, it is said that we are in Lebanon today for the purpose of protecting our national interests in that area.

It was about 37 years ago that President Harry Truman stated a doctrine that became known as the Truman Doctrine. He essentially said that whenever and wherever aggression indirectly or directly threatens the peace, the U.S. interests are involved. A rather vague statement, but something that we have mechanistically followed. We have been robots since that policy was established.

Minor changes in troop locations in that area of the world will do nothing to change the situation. Basic policy must be addressed, basic policy must change.

Tactical adjustments with the troops will only keep us involved and committed in that area.

U.S. interests, if they are vaguely defined and we equate them with the U.S. security, we are bound to get into a lot more trouble before we can settle the difficult situation that we face in the Mideast.

FERC MEDDLES IN STATE AFFAIRS

(Mr. BETHUNE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, the Federal bureaucrats have done it again. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission is meddling in State affairs in such a way that it could raise electric rates in Arkansas by as much as 48 percent.

I hold the view that any such increase is presumably unfair and should be delayed for review by the Congress.

I have introduced legislation to prohibit for at least a year the implementation of any decision by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission which would result in such an increase. Plus we have petitioned formally to intervene in the FERC proceedings in an effort to protect Arkansas from the unfair rate increase.

This energy problem, however, is just the tip of the iceberg of a whole series of problems that will develop for the South and for Arkansas and for America as a result of increasing Federal Government intervention.

The transfer of power to Washington and away from the States and regions has been a tragic mistake. This is just the first of many decisions in energy, credit, finance, water, labor, and other fields that will impede progress and prosperity in Arkansas and America.

CONSIDERATION OF VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER AMENDMENT

(Mr. GREGG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to permit voluntary school prayer.

□ 1230

The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have the clearance of the majority and the minority leadership. This request has been cleared with the minority leadership. I now yield to a spokesman for the majority leadership for an appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response.

This is the 10th consecutive legislative day that this request has been made, and the issue of school prayer remains the captive of the arrogance of the leadership of the House.

It must be clear to the American people by this time that the reason we do not have the option of voluntary school prayer in our schools throughout this country is because the Democratic liberal leadership of this House refuses to allow us to vote on that issue.

THE DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP STANDS IN THE WAY OF LINE-ITEM VETO

(Mrs. VUCANOVICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to permit a line-item veto.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships.

This request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of a line-item veto—the Democratic leadership of this House.

JUSTICE AND FAIRNESS REGARDING THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

(Mr. PETRI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

● Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, leadership in a democracy requires that those who control the legislative agenda maintain standards of fairness toward their opponents. Yet, last November the leadership in this House attempted to use patently unfair parliamentary tactics in order to pass the equal rights amendment without the possibility of appending a clarifying amendment.

Many of the proponents of the equal rights amendment insist that the ERA would have no effect, one way or the other, on the issue of abortion. Why, then, has there been such resistance to the addition of language which would make this explicit, and which would satisfy those of us who agonize over the massacre of some 1,500,000 preborn children each year through abortion?

Mr. Speaker, all I am asking for is fairness. I support equal rights for women, and I want to be able to vote for equal rights with a clear conscience. If and when the equal rights amendment is rescheduled for consideration by the House, justice and fairness require that it be considered under an open rule, so that the House can have a chance to clarify the ERA by specifying that it will not guarantee the right to abortion, or to Federal funding of abortion.●

HONOR ROLL OF BUDGET BUSTERS

(Mr. HUNTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, several days ago, a number of Members from the Democratic side of the aisle stood here to criticize and attack President Reagan for the budget that he sent to the Hill, and to criticize him as being a deficit spender.

Mr. Speaker, we have complied a list of 18 key votes, votes that could have reduced the deficit by some $22.1 billion had they been passed.

Now, concerning those Members who attacked the President as being a deficit spender, I would like to add their names to the honor roll of budget busters:

Mr. MOODY of Wisconsin, 16 of 18, budget busting votes for $21.6 billion in deficit spending; Mr. DOWNEY of New York, 17 of 17, budget busting votes for $21 billion in deficit spending; Mr. RAHALL of West Virginia, 16 of 18, budget busting votes for $22.1 billion in deficit spending; Mr. WEISS of New York, 18 of 18, budget busting votes for $22 billion in deficit spending; Mr. MARKEY of Massachusetts, 17 of 17, budget busting votes for $21 billion in deficit spending

A few more names, Mr. Speaker, on the honor roll of deficit spenders.

ATTORNEY GENERAL MUST BE SOMEONE WE CAN TRUST TO ENFORCE ALL OUR LAWS

(Mr. MOODY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, our colleagues in the Senate will soon consider President Reagan's nomination of Edward Meese as Attorney General. I urge our colleagues in the other body to take an extremely close look at the record of this man who would shape our country's policy on Justice-related issues.

First, this man was the prime force behind President Reagan's effort to convert the Civil Rights Commission into a mere mouthpiece for the administration policy rather than remain an independent, nonpartisan watchdog for civil rights and racial equality.

Second, Mr. Meese has consistently and repeatedly spearheaded efforts to abolish the Legal Services Corporation, which often provides the only recourse of our Nation's poor have to legal assistance.

Third, Mr. Meese has said there was little proof of hunger in America, adding that people went to soup lines because it was cheaper and easier.

The Attorney General of this great Nation must be someone we can trust to enforce our laws, all of our laws, just as they are written, regardless of personal or private political point of view. Unfortunately, Mr. Meese's record and frequent comments reveal a personal interpretation of our Constitution, our laws, and our traditions that makes expectation of balanced enforcement unlikely to be met.

Again, I urge our colleagues in the Senate to carefully consider the consequences of placing this man in such a high position of national trust.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BIAGGI). The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, is it correct that we are not supposed to refer in any way to actions of the Senate on the floor of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the Chair.

THE DEFICIT

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, who are we kidding on the subject of the deficit?

The President has tried to blame the deficits on the Congress.

It will not work. It is his budget. It is his defense buildup. He did not veto a single appropriations bill last year. He asked for the IMF bailout. He calls even now for increased foreign aid, new space laboratories and for large sums for Central America.

On the other hand, the Congress blames the President. Well, it is not his problem alone, either. We did not give him the spending cuts he asked for. We continue to come up with new programs that cost money we do not have.

We continue to embrace the myths of deficit reduction. You have heard them:

No. 1, growth will take care of the deficit. It will not.

No. 2, deficits do not really cause high interest rates. They do.

No. 3, we have time; wait until 1985. We do not. We should act now.

The American people know that on the subject of the deficit, the Congress and the administration are just like Louisiana bullfrogs, all mouth and no guts.

Well, we can run, we can jump. But on the deficit, we cannot hide.

RETIREMENT FOR FEDERAL GUARDSMEN AND RESERVISTS

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring attention to a potential problem for members of the National Guard and Reserves created by language contained in H.R. 4170, the Tax Reform Act.

As you know, Federal employees who were on board prior to December 31, 1983, have the right to remain under civil service retirement and not come under social security retirement.

The language I am referring to, takes that right away from Federal employees who are Guardsmen or Reservists in the event they are mobilized for war. Upon their return from military service, they would be forced into the social security retirement system.

This will undoubtedly have a serious impact on Guard and Reserve recruitment and retention. These men and women should not be penalized for their willingness to serve in the military. I, therefore, urge removal of this harmful language from H.R. 4170.

VETERANS EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM AMENDMENTS OF 1984

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Veterans Educational Assistance Program (VEAP) Amendments of 1983. This bill will allow members of the armed forces to collect interest on their post-Vietnam-era education accounts. It will also let them transfer their benefits to a spouse or child.

If enacted, these amendments are intended to update the current VEAP, which was first put into effect in 1977. Currently, VEAP participants will contribute to their education account either on a monthly basis, or in one lump sum payment. The total contribution is then matched by the military on a 2-to-1 basis, to be used for education benefits at a later date.

However, these matching funds are not contributed until the benefits are used, in most cases several years after the original contributions have been invested. Participation in the current VEAP has been light, and the Army contends that it is the noninterest bearing feature of the program, tying up current dollars eventually eroded by inflation, that acts as the greatest disincentive for a disciplined monthly educational savings plan. With the amendments I am proposing, the accrued interest would help to offset the real value of the individual's contribution when applied to an educational program years after the soldier initially began to contribute.

In a similar manner, the transferability provision of these amendments is designed to offset the retention disincentive of the current VEAP. This problem also existed with the old GI bill, since it requires the service member to leave military service in order to use the benefit at a full-time rate. The availability to transfer the VEAP benefits to a spouse or child acts as a retention incentive for individuals to stay with the military. Preliminary data suggests that approximately 26 percent more soldiers who are in their second term of enlistment would reenlist if this transferability feature becomes available.

I recently discussed the current VEAP, along with these proposed amendments with General John Wickham, Chief of Staff of the Army. General Wickham is in complete support of the VEAP Amendments of 1983, since it encourages individuals to remain with the armed services when they have families. By providing future education benefits not only for service members, but for children and spouses, we are continuing in our efforts to focus attention on the importance of the family in military life.

INVESTIGATION OF U.S. WEATHER SERVICE LACK OF WARNING ON UPPER MIDWEST BLIZZARD

(Mr. STANGELAND asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, this past week-end 21 lives were lost as a near record breaking blizzard tore through the upper midwest and the brunt of the storm hit western Minnesota and eastern North Dakota, and eastern South Dakota.

From my vantage point, it is my opinion that the U.S. Weather Service failed to give an adequate and timely warning that weather of this serious magnitude was in store for this area. If proper warnings could have been given there would have been a chance that lives could have been saved.

The blizzard was doing severe damage, transportation was at a standstill, all commercial traffic including air travel was halted and the Weather Service did not see fit to issue an emergency warning until too late.

This should not have happened and it must not happen again. Today I have asked the Subcommittee on Natural Resources of the Science and Technology Committee to hold an investigation of the actions of the U.S. Weather Service. The staff of the subcommittee has told me that such investigation will be held. Congress, using its oversight procedures, must make as certain as possible that this will not happen again.

ADMINISTRATION PACT WITH THE DEVIL

(Mr. STARK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration has lied about El Salvador. They have made a pact with the devil, in the person of Roberto D'Aubuisson.

Yesterday, former Ambassador Robert White testified that the potential president of El Salvador, Roberto D'Aubuisson, brought together a group of fellow butchers to draw lots—yes, draw lots—for the honor of assassinating Catholic Archbishop Romero.

Ambassador White stated, under oath, that the Reagan administration has known of D'Aubuisson's monstrous crime since entering office. Mr. White says he sent this information to Washington.

I want the truth now. I want United States aid to El Salvador to be based on the human rights record of the recipients, now.

This administration's policy toward El Salvador makes us all accomplices in crime. I will not be an accomplice of Roberto D'Aubuisson. I will vote no on military aid to El Salvador. I will vote yes to reinstate the certification requirement.

WHO STANDS IN THE WAY OF A BALANCED BUDGET?

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to require a balanced budget. The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership.

I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of a balanced budget—the Democratic leadership of this House.

WE MUST LOOK AT ALL AREAS OF THE BUDGET

(Mr. MACK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, this morning I had the opportunity to attend the second Budget Committee hearing of this session. Let me share some of the facts with my colleagues.

Fact No. 1 is that if we continue in the pattern of spending that we have been headed for the last several years, by 1989 we will spend 24.9 percent of GNP. I asked the question about what is the highest level of taxation that we have ever reached, and the highest level of taxation that we have reached since the 1960's is about 20.8 percent.

So I would suggest that even if we raise taxes which I oppose to the point where we would be at 20.8 percent, we still have 4.1 percent of GNP to attack.

What people try to tell us is that the simple answer is that we have to do is reduce defense spending. Let me tell my colleagues another little fact that came out.

The CBO indicated that if defense spending only increased in nominal terms—nominal terms means allowing for inflation—not in real terms but only in nominal terms between now and 1989, the deficit in 1989 would still be $249 billion.

The suggestion I am making is that all of us better wake up to the fact that we have to look at all other areas of the budget, including those precious entitlements if we are to take control of Government spending.

JESSE JAMES RIDES AGAIN

(Mr. DORGAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Montana (Mr. MARLENEE) this morning for bringing to the attention of the House the difficult problem that we face with respect to railroad service in rural America.

Back in the mid-1930's when Harry Truman was serving in the other body, he rose and he talked about the railroads. He said back in Independence, Mo., when Jesse James and his gang robbed a train, the hometown newspaper had headlines saying "Jesse James Gang Robs Train, Nets $3,000."

Harry Truman said:

> Today they are still robbing those trains, but it is accountants and attorneys who are robbing them by setting up something called a holding company.

What they do is strip those trains bare, he said. They take the land grants away that we gave them and then plead poverty for the railroad.

Mr. Speaker, 23 percent of my home State of North Dakota was given to the railroads; think of it, 23 percent of North Dakota was a land grant to the railroads to build and operate a railroad. Now, what they have done is formed holding companies. They have taken those land grants away, taken the rich timber and mineral and oil interests away, and then plead poverty for the railroad. They abandon branch lines, and hike their rates.

I commend the gentleman from Montana, Mr. MARLENEE, for bringing that to the attention of the House. We have legislation in this House to deal with this, and we must start moving in the right direction on railroad policy. I hope we can have some hearings and get this Congress to take some action to tell the railroads that we are not going to put up with this behavior any longer.

AN ALTERNATIVE TO CUT SPENDING

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. ROEMER) here but just moments ago he was in the well giving a 1-minute speech decrying the existence of the deficit and seeking to place accountability, I think he said, on the President for the deficit.

I want to assure the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ROEMER, that he and all of the Members of the House will have an opportunity, when we take up the first concurrent resolution on the budget this year, to vote on a proposal to cut spending in 1985 by at least $45 billion. If we embellish that amount by rcommendations from the Heritage Foundation, which has identified $95 billion which can be cut from spending in 1985, we can add it up by an even greater amount.

I thought the gentleman from Louisiana would like to know that an alternative will be presented on the floor of the House for him to vote to cut spending to deal with this deficit. I thought the gentleman would like to know that, and perhaps other Members of the House would like to know it as well.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURPHY). Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken today after debate has been concluded on all motions to suspend the rules.

CONTINUATION OF CERTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS WITH RESPECT TO EL SALVADOR

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4656) to continue in effect the current certification requirements with respect to El Salvador until the Congress enacts new legislation providing conditions for U.S. military assistance to El Salvador or until the end of fiscal year 1984, whichever occurs first.

H.R. 4656

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the requirements of section 728 of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981 (including the last sentence of subsection (e) of that section) shall continue to apply after the end of the fiscal year 1983 until such time as the Congress enacts new legislation providing conditions for United States military assistance to El Salvador or until September 30, 1984, whichever occurs first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNES) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNES).

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before us would continue in effect the certification requirement with respect to El Salvador through the end of the current fiscal year or until such time as Congress enacts superseding legislation, whichever comes first.

As all the Members know, during the past 2 fiscal years the President was required to certify every 6 months, as a condition of continuing to give military aid to El Salvador, that the Government of El Salvador:

Was making a concerted and significant effort to comply with internationally recognized human rights;

Was achieving substantial control over its armed forces so as to bring an end to the indiscriminate torture and murder of civilians by those forces;

Was making continued progress in implementing the land reform program and other reforms;

Was committed to the holding of free elections and to discussing with opposition forces a political solution to the conflict; and

Had made good faith efforts to investigate the murders of U.S. citizens in El Salvador and to bring those responsible to justice.

This requirement expired on September 30, at the end of the last fiscal year. In anticipation of that, and because a fiscal year 1984 foreign aid bill with a new certification requirement in it had not been enacted, I introduced a routine extension of the existing certification requirement. On September 30, the House took up and passed that bill, H.R. 4042, by unanimous consent. I was pleased to have the support of the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO), for that measure, and I was equally pleased that the administration expressed no objection to the bill. The Senate also passed the bill unanimously.

Unexpectedly, however, the President pocket vetoed the bill on November 30. So we now bring this measure before you again. We have, in effect, already enacted it twice: once in 1981 when we first enacted the certification measure; then again last September when we extended it by unanimous consent. So I hope we can now treat it as routine.

When the Foreign Affairs Committee receives the administration's recommendations for implementing the Kissinger Commission report, hopefully any day now, we will begin considering a new certification requirement in the context of those recommendations. Several of us are already being consulted by the administration about that requirement. But pending enactment of new language, we should reenact the old language in order to insure that the Salvadoran Government knows that it must meet legal requirements in order to continue to qualify for U.S. military aid.

I want to stress for my colleagues that there is no disagreement that there should be conditions on military aid for El Salvador. For understandable reasons, the administration prefers conditions other than those stated in this bill. But the Congress has spoken twice on this issue, and I believe it is important for us to reaffirm our determination that our conditions be restored to the law.

Several of our colleagues on this side want to speak, but at this point I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution, not because it is the best approach, but rather because it is the only alternative we were being offered and Congress should be involved.

Many of us have been concerned for some time that the "all or nothing" approach represented by the certification procedure in this language does not help U.S. security interests or the cause of human rights. The chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. BARNES, has said on a number of occasions that he thought this certification language had a number of flaws. That is the reason the Foreign Affairs Committee last year adopted a quite different bipartisan alternative.

Unfortunately, the issue of the merits of this particular certification procedure gets lost in a cloud of rhetoric and hyperbole. Many of those who are intent on criticizing this administration for its policy toward El Salvador seem to believe that this certification language is the equivalent of holy writ. They, therefore, argue that if the administration is against this language, then it is against conditioning aid to El Salvador and likewise has no interest in human rights. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

The President chose not to approve the extension of this certification because it does not help to improve human rights conditions in El Salvador. It has instead promoted a regular, 6-month "certification offensive" where the extreme left and extreme right step up their campaigns of violence and destruction in an effort to influence the findings of the certification report.

Critics argue that by vetoing the certification extension, the President diluted any message he had sent on the death squads. But they are wrong on that account as well. The President and Vice President BUSH as well as other administration officials over the past months have made absolutely clear their total rejection of the right-wing death squad activities in El Salvador. I know, I was in El Salvador on December 11 with Vice President BUSH. Furthermore, the President believes that by his stressing the need for continued progress on human rights he is demonstrating his personal concern and is not simply doing something because the Congress has forced him to.

As for the merits, or lack thereof, of this certification language, it seems to me to represent the grossest example of twisted logic imaginable. We in the Congress began with a situation in El Salvador 4 years ago where human rights conditions were unacceptable by anyone's definition. If you ranked that country on a scale of 1 to 10 and gave it a 5, most critics would say you were being overly generous. In order to promote improved human rights, a certification process was instituted. The irony of this language is that now that human rights have improved to perhaps 7 or 8 on that scale, this all or nothing approach, the critics contend, requires "0" aid because the Salvadorans have failed to score "10."

I have yet to hear one convincing argument as to how human rights will be improved in that country if all military aid is cut off. About the only thing a total cutoff of military aid would achieve would probably be a rightwing military coup, which would not help human rights, followed by a leftist guerrilla victory, which also would not help human rights.

This administration is supporting the democratic center in El Salvador fighting for its very existence against violence from the right and the left. The United States is giving military aid not only because it is in the interests of promoting democracy in El Salvador but also because it is in the interests of the United States.

Yes; we must condition our military aid to El Salvador. But Let us do it in a way that means something. I reluctantly support the extension of this certification language only in the hope that we will soon have before us something to replace it that more closely reflects the compromise language the Foreign Affairs Committee agreed to in May of last year. I urge my colleagues to look for a constructive alternative so that we may accomplish what we all wish: improved human rights in El Salvador and protection of our national security interests.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, could I just ask procedurally, is there going to be time for discussion by other Members of the body or is it going to be limited?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Well, anybody who asks for time, I will yield.

Mr. KEMP. Has the gentleman got 20 minutes?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Yes.

Mr. KEMP. Are there any other Members who want to speak on the subject?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Yes.

Mr. KEMP. Is there enough time to take 3 or 4 minutes at some point in the debate?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I would think so, yes.

Mr. KEMP. Then I will wait my time, but I would like 4 or 5 minutes.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the very distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation.

I would like to commend the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNES) for once again bringing before the House this important legislation to extend the certification requirement for military assistance to El Salvador.

The Congress enacted a similar bill, H.R. 4042, at the end of the first session of this Congress, but it was subjected to a pocket veto by the President.

It is important that the Congress send a strong message that U.S. military assistance to El Salvador will be forthcoming only if there is substantial progress in respect for human rights and implementation of critical social, economic, and political reforms. Only through such efforts will the Salvadoran Government be able to win the support of the people and, consequently, will U.S. military assistance be effective.

I urge prompt enactment of this legislation. Subsequently, during the normal course of consideration of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the fiscal year 1985 foreign assistance program, the Committee will fashion an updated provision conditioning U.S. military assistance on the requisite reforms and respect for human rights.

On September 30, 1983, this body passed the predecessor legislation, H.R. 4042, by voice vote. I urge Members to replicate that action here today.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. STUDDS).

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman.

I rise in support of this resolution, which I consider to be literally the least Congress can responsibly do to deal with the ongoing tragedy of human rights violations in El Salvador.

We know far more today about the source of killing and torture in El Salvador than we have in the past—thanks not to President Reagan or to the investigative resources of the Congress—but instead to the press, and to our former Ambassador to El Salvador, Robert White.

In testimony given yesterday before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Ambassador White said that the United States has been aware for 4 years of a credible, eyewitness account demonstrating that the man who is now the president of the Constituent Assembly of El Salvador personally ordered the assassination of Archbishop Oscar Romero in March 1980.

Ambassador White disclosed, as well, firsthand credible accounts of the formation and operation of rightwing death squads, financed from Miami, and operating in association with, or tolerated by, high level officials of the Salvadoran military. This is the same military which President Reagan this past week suggested we reward with more than $300 million in additional weapons aid.

The President and other administration officials have recently appeared to admit the bankruptcy of their own frequently repeated belief that "silent diplomacy" is always the most effective method for encouraging an ideologically friendly government to observe certain fundamental principles of law and decency in the treatment of their own people. They have admitted this through a series of highly publicized—and long overdue—statements of the obvious; that is, that if the Government of El Salvador falls to its leftist opposition, it will fall not because of the strength of that opposition, but because of its own indifference to the murderous practices of elements within its own military, and of death squads allied to that military.

But these welcome statements—from Secretary of State Shultz, Ambassador Pickering, Vice President BUSH, and the President, himself—have far less weight than the concrete actions taken recently to make it plain that human rights is, and always will be, a decidedly secondary consideration for this administration—an afterthought, not a cornerstone, of American policy.

Last December, the President vetoed the very mild certification legislation we are considering today. The headlines in El Salvador's most rightwing newspaper the next morning read gleefully: "Aid Without Conditions". Last week, the President stunned even his most consistent critics by proposing that military aid to El Salvador be more than tripled over the next 18 months. These two actions provide greater assurance to the killers who every day exercise the real power in what we wishfully call democratic El Salvador than any rhetoric about human rights that this administration has been able to produce.

The President has an alternative to this certification bill, and to stronger proposals that would involve Congress more deeply in the critical judgments about the course of events in El Salvador. His alternative is simple. Congress should appropriate a third of a billion dollars in new military aid and trust the President to withhold some or all of it if the Salvadoran military does not stop murdering its own people. The President, we are assured, understands the nature of the situation in E! Salvador, and will act with firmness and resolve to improve the human rights situation in that country.

I mean no disrespect—because I sincerely believe that this President does not understand what it takes to murder 20,000 innocent human beings in the name of anticommunism in less than 4 years—which is precisely what our allies in El Salvador have done. I do not think the President understands the nature of the Salvadoran military, or of the desperation which has driven many Salvadorans to rebel; I do not think he understands the misery behind the statistics, and I think he is too trusting of those who share his opposition to communism, but not his sense of decency or human values.

But the fact remains that trusting President Reagan to implement a human rights policy on his own would be as curiously inappropriate as putting Anne Gorsuch in charge of the environment; James Watt in charge of natural resources; or Edwin Meese in charge of protecting the civil rights of the poor.

Congress must play a role in our policy toward El Salvador if that policy is to bear any resemblance at all to the principles and ideals which we have, as a nation, long espoused, and which must be implemented if our long-term national interest in a stable and democratic Central America is to be served. That is what this certification bill is all about, and I hope—and trust—it will be approved.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD).

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I offer my support of H.R. 4656, a measure to extend the certification requirements on military aid to El Salvador.

While I support this legislation and the need for conditioning our aid to El Salvador, I have serious reservations about the specific language of this particular certification procedure. The problem with this language is its "all or nothing" character. It takes a complicated political, social, and military situation in El Salvador and says we must judge it in "black and white" terms. Either the Salvadoran Government exhibits perfection in meeting standards set for it by the U.S. Congress or it suffers the fate of being cut off from any U.S. military assistance.

The original intent of having a certification requirement was to promote improvements in human rights conditions. I believe there have been improvements, but conditions on aid are still needed, and it is appropriate that we, in the Congress, establish conditions that will serve as a stimulus for further progress. I think the best way to do that would be to implement the Fascell compromise which the Foreign Affairs Committee agreed to by a vote of 35 to 1 last May. The Fascell language offers an approach which is both constructive and compelling. Furthermore, it has the advantage of not requiring a total cutoff of aid, but rather phased increments of aid going to El Salvador as progress on meeting certain goals is demonstrated.

Since, for the moment, H.R. 4656 is the only alternative we have before us, and we must consider it under suspension of the rules without the opportunity to amend it, I am supporting this certification language. But I urge my colleagues to develop new language which we can more strongly support and which will better serve our interests and our efforts to improve human rights.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Subcommitee on Western Hemisphere Affairs for introducing this resolution. I certainly urge its passing.

From the end of World War II until 1979, total U.S. aid to El Salvador was $263.5 million. In the last 4 years since 1979, the American people have sent $1.1 billion to that country. During a time of unprecedented budget deficits, when the needs of our own cities are greater than ever, when the poor and middle class of our country are warned of further sacrifices awaiting them, it is certainly necessary to ask what their $1.1 billion has bought them in El Salvador. Unfortunately, the answer is, not much.

In the 4 years that the American people have sent over $1 billion of their money to El Salvador, anywhere from $750 million to $1.5 billion have been transferred out of the country by wealthy Salvadorans. The ugly, nocturnal hunts of the Death Squads have resulted in the murders of thousands upon thousands of El Salvador citizens. Even American citizens have not been spared, including our American churchwoman whose families and friends are still awaiting some resolution to their cases, now 4 years later. The recent administration decision to classify Judge Tyler's report on the murders only prolongs the families' pain and raises questions about the administration's good faith and intentions in pursuing a resolution to this long-standing case. Military aid to El Salvador has brought little progress: defections from Government forces to the rebels are reported to be frequent. Many of the weapons, as well as ammunition, that we send to the El Salvador Government forces end up in the hands of the rebels either through capture or purchase from Government units. The U.S.-trained Army of El Salvador has been singularly ineffective in its encounters with rebel units. Economic assistance earmarked for the poor is routinely sold in El Salvador marketplaces, after passing through the hands of middlemen.

While U.S. aid levels to El Salvador have increased manyfold in the last few years, a successful resolution of the economic, social, and political problems of that country and region seem more remote than ever. The reason more and more American aid is buying less and less can be traced to a fundamental and obvious flaw in the administration's approach to the region. That fundamental flaw is dramatically exposed by our having to even consider this legislation, H.R. 4656. That flaw is the root cause of the deteriorating situation in El Salvador.

This administration came into office declaring that an emphasis on human rights is irrelevant to our foreign policy. Events in El Salvador demonstrate the opposite: A successful foreign policy in Central America must be based on a respect for human rights and human dignity. It is precisely because of the Salvadoran oligarchy's blatant disrespect for human rights that our foreign policy in the region is in such disarrary. The rebels in El Salvador have been successful in attracting support, not because the common people of that country are anxious to take orders from Moscow or Havana. They are turning to the rebels because they have no other place to go. By vetoing H.R. 4042, which linked U.S. aid to El Salvador to a respect for human rights, the administration, in effect, gave the ruling oligarchy there a signal to continue the policies that have given the death squads a blank check to commit any crime to stay in power and maintain control. By vetoing H.R. 4042, the administration forfeited the moral high ground to the left.

It is therefore again up to Congress to make it clear that our country stands for some fundamental values, to make it clear that any aid offered by the American people must be applied to the pursuit of certain fundamental values. Last fall, Congress made it clear that aid to El Salvador must be contingent on decency and adherence to human rights. The 11-member Central American Commission agreed—with 3 exceptions—that any aid we provide that region will be wasted unless there is adherence to human rights; $1.1 billion spent in El Savlador in the last 4 years has already been wasted.

It should be clear by now, that the President's pocket veto of the human rights conditionality clause is simply bad policy. Public opinion polls and letters to congressional offices indicate the American people expect adherence to human rights as a condition of aid.

I commend the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs for introducing this bill and I urge its passage.

□ 1300

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN).

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker. I rise in support of H.R. 4656, legislation to continue in effect the certification requirement with respect to El Salvador for fiscal year 1984. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this measure which I believe leaves no doubt about the high priority our Nation places on the need for El Salvador to promote and to respect the human rights of its own citizens and to complete the long overdue process of bringing to justice the murderers of our own citizens.

I regretted that the administration decided to pocket veto an identical measure which Congress adopted unanimously last session. I supported that legislation because I believed it sent an appropriate signal of our concerns for any violation of human rights to the Government of El Salvator.

Because the legislation conditioning U.S. assistance on progress on human rights expired during the last Congress, there is no statutory obligation requiring Salvadoran efforts to improve their respect for human rights. While I fully support and commend the administration for initiatives to obtain El Salvador's support for more progress on human rights, I believe a legislative mandate, such as that provided by H.R. 4656, will place in better perspective the critical importance our Nation attaches to Salvadoran efforts to help foster those conditions creating an environment where basic human rights are assured.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 4656.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my friend, the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. DORGAN).

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Many of us in Congress have had the opportunity to travel to Central America and view firsthand what is happening in that region, in Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Costa Rica.

All of us, I think, share the same goal. We certainly want our foreign policy to work in that region.

We understand there is a great deal of turmoil and trouble in that region, and that is why we are having this debate today. But to visit that region is to realize that this is a region that is engulfed by poverty and hunger and sickness.

I am not suggesting that we ought not resist and oppose communism. Certainly we should resist and oppose communism in that region. But the question is, can we successfully oppose communism by embracing governments who seem blind to executions of innocent civilians that are going on in their own country, not by the hundreds but by the tens of thousands? The answer clearly is "no."

Let me just put in perspective what El Salvador is: El Salvador is one-tenth the size of the congressional district I represent. It has several million people, about 25,000 or 30,000 soldiers, about 7,000 or 8,000 or 9,000 insurgents out in the country someplace. One percent of the people own 60 percent of the property. Hunger, poverty, and illiteracy are rampant. Rightwing death squads roam the country and line people up at 2 a.m. in the morning and assassinate them—men, women, and children. That is El Salvador, and that is the instability we are trying to create a foreign policy to combat.

The one thing that I see around this world is that the Soviets can match us gun for gun and bullet for bullet anywhere in the world. But what they need the most in Central America is food.

The Soviets cannot produce enough food for themselves. We produce far more than we need, and our grain bins are bulging.

Why can we not send more food, and more medicine, and more educational help? Why cannot our foreign policy be better constructed to help people in Central America rather than some of the governments that repress those people.

I think we share the same goal. We all want to be successful in our foreign policy in Central America.

All I am saying is that the policies we have put in place under this administration are policies that embrace the wrong authorities, embrace the wrong governments, and do not give help to the people who desperately need it.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP).

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate my friend yielding.

I am not anxious to get into a battle or a debate with my friend from North Dakota; but very frankly, the whole Kissinger Commission report authorized by the President and this body addresses exactly the points that were made by the previous speaker. The administration is asking for $8 billion over the next 5 years to help address those problems of human poverty and disease and illiteracy to which he alluded foreign aid alone is not going to solve all the problems. I know, but it will make a significant positive impact upon our neighbors and friends to the south and in Central America who also call themselves Americans.

But President Reagan and Mr. Kissinger, and statesmen such as Lane Kirkland, and Robert Strauss, and the vast majority of the center of this debate reject any tradeoff between security and human rights.

We need both. There is a war going on. There are problems, to be sure. But there will be no chance of any human rights reforms in Central America if we have an abstract, static, conditionality process that would impose an automatic cutoff in aid, as this resolution does.

I worked with the gentleman from Maryland. I like him and I respect him. I consider him and the gentleman from New York to be responsible Members of the Congress in trying to further the cause of human rights but this process is endangering human rights progress by threatening to cut off aid in the middle of a Marxist-Leninist inspired war.

But the Kissinger Commission says explicitly that we should not so interpret conditionally so as to undermine our security interests in Central America.

I am just disappointed that this important measure has come up under suspension of the rules. This summary procedure does not allow for a thoughtful consideration or deliberation. Forty minutes is not enough time for meaningful debate. And since no amendments are allowed, Members are precluded from offering language to improve the resolution.

The President vetoed this bill not because he did not want rigid conditions on our aid to Central America. There are conditions on our aid to Central America. I am the ranking member on the Foreign Operations Committee. We have very strong conditions on security assistance. By act of this Congress, the Salvadoran Government is required to make progress in land reform. They have to make progress in their judicial system. They have to make progress with regard to bringing to justice the murderers of the nuns and the murderers of the labor union leaders. There has to be an unambiguous end to death squad activity.

Those are conditions of our foreign aid programs for Central America. But there has been progress by El Salvador and we should recognize it and encourage more progress rather then threatening to cut off aid.

□ 1310

The administration, I would say to my friend from Maryland, has been quite candid and positive in coming up with language to try to meet the concerns of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNES). Frankly I am disappointed that we bring this bill to a vote under such constraints that leave us really no option other than to vote for it or against it.

From my standpoint, I think this legislation is a mistake. We already have strong conditions on our aid. This bill is too static, it is too abstract, it does not recognize at all that there has been progress.

And why just single out El Salvador? If we held Lebanon to this level of human rights progress, Lebanon would not get any support. Does anybody think, in this room, that Pakistan could meet the conditions of this type of conditionality? No way. I do not know whether Egypt could either.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman (Mr. KEMP) has expired.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield an additional 30 seconds to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. Briefly, because I do not have much time.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I point out to the gentleman that the bill that we are discussing is not the one that the gentleman (Mr. KEMP) is describing. The bill before us would require progress; it does not require that they have reached the ultimate Jeffersonian democracy the gentleman is describing.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take my time back.

Mr. BARNES. All it requires is that we make progress, that is all we ask.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate that. I take back my time if I can just say——

Mr. BARNES. That is all we ask.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, may I have my time back?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The gentleman cannot take his time back unless he is yielded time, additional time.

Mr. KEMP. I was trying to get my time back in the middle of the gentleman's (Mr. BARNES) remarks.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to yield 1 minute additional to the gentleman (Mr. KEMP) if he will accept it.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate that, my friend yielding and it is consistent with his good will toward all views being expressed and I thank him for it. He is a gentleman.

Let me say to my friend from Maryland, the President vetoed this language not because he is against conditionality but because he thought this process and this bill were too static and too rigid in its application. If applied as rigidly as the language calls for it could set back the cause of democracy in El Salvador. All we are doing is overriding that veto in a circuitous way.

I am not going to support this bill. I think it is a mistake. I understand the deep concern that the gentleman from Maryland has. But this legislation does not recognize that there has been progress and we need to foster that progress and it ought to be done simultaneously with security assistance. By acting preemptively, we deny the Bipartisan Commission on Central America a chance to bring its very thoughtful and progressive Central America policy recommendations to the attention of the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, that section of the Commission's report which endorsed some form of certification requirement for military aid to El Salvador is not something that can be taken apart from the other recommendations for our overall policy for the region. It should be reviewed in concert with our total policy, and not handled in this summary fashion embodied in H.R. 4656.

For example, the Kissinger report warns that "were military aid to be cut off * * * such a development would be unacceptable from the standpoint of both human rights and security."

As responsible legislators, I believe that any legislation requiring certification should also require a report on the impact of cutting off military aid on the human rights situation in El Salvador. That is something we cannot ignore.

This recognition prompted Dr. Kissinger's dissent and caution: The President and the Congress should not interpret the Commission's recommendations in any fashion that would undermine U.S. security interests in Central America. I agree.

That type of "all or nothing" approach is not constructive statecraft. It is not sensitive to unique considerations. For example, the human rights situation in Lebanon is a tragedy—but is that the fault of the Lebanese Government? With respect to El Salvador, we also must ask what the impact of withholding military aid would be. Who would be hurt—human rights abusers, or the victims of the left—the people of El Salvador?

And we must remember, there is a war going on in Central America, and it is extremely difficult to help your society improve when it is under attack. Even under these extraordinarily difficult circumstances, the Government of El Salvador has managed to hold free elections, in which over 80 percent of the voting age public participated despite terrorist threats from the guerrillas. A majority of the countries in the world today do not have a free press, but El Salvador does. Freedom of religion is strictly respected. This is a country that is struggling to grow democratically; and I believe that as Americans we should help.

Procedurally, I question the decision to bring this controversial resolution before the Congress under suspension of the rules. Because no amendments are in order, and because debate is severely limited, the House has little and inadequate opportunity to examine the legislation and its implications.

I am dissatisfied by this procedure because I believe that, by working together in this body and with the administration, we could fashion legislation that would make a positive contribution to what has always been a central objective of U.S. foreign policy: promoting American ideals and democratic institutions, and human rights.

As the senior Republican on the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, I sponsored legislation to require periodic reports from the Department of State and the Treasury evaluating the economic and social conditions of countries that receive U.S. aid, so that we can assess the effectiveness of our aid in promoting economic freedom and economic liberties, without which human rights are forfeit.

I would like to see such evaluations provided to Congress on a regular basis, not just with respect to El Salvador, and not limited to military aid, but with respect to our aid programs throughout the world.

I do not believe that this dated resolution in any way represents the best we can do. Nor do I believe that its enactment into law would advance human rights in El Salvador, or U.S. security interests in the region.

I fully expect that more thoughtful legislation will be forthcoming in the months ahead. I hope that my colleague MIKE BARNES will play an instrumental role in fashioning that legislation, and I look forward to working with him toward that goal.

I would urge the Members to vote against this bill.

I thank the gentleman (Mr. BARNES) for his time.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ).

Mr. SOLARZ. I thank our very able and distinguished chairman for yielding me the time.

I suppose this bill is better than nothing, Mr. Speaker, but not much more. When it was first adopted the whole purpose of the certification was to make it clear to the Government of El Salvador that unless they achieved substantial control over their own security forces, thereby bringing to an end the indiscriminate torture and murder of the people of El Salvador by those forces, they would no longer be able to receive American military assistance.

Since the adoption of this legislation, however, the number of noncombatant deaths in El Salvador has reached tens of thousands. Yet in spite of that sad and lamentable fact, the President of the United States has nevertheless submittted the required certifications to the Congress on the grounds that the situation in El Salvador is getting better.

Consequently, it is very difficult for me to be overly optimistic that the reenactment of this legislation will enable us to achieve the primary purpose for which the certification was enacted originally, which is to bring the involvement of the security forces in El Salvador in the death squads in that country to an end.

I have no reason to conclude the President is any more likely to submit fair and accurate certifications in the future than he has been in the past.

But I want to say to my colleagues in the House that that is relatively irrelevant in comparison to the far greater problem that confronts us in the weeks ahead.

We are now faced by a request from the administration for a very substantial increase in the level of military assistance to El Salvador. I want to serve notice that there are those of us in this House who will not support anything like the kind of increase the administration is requesting unless we can reach agreement on a new form of certification legislation designed to accomplish the job of making it clear that unless the authorities in El Salvador get rid of these death squads, they are not going to be able to receive additional military assistance. And when we approach that task, which I hope we can do in a bipartisan fashion, I trust no one will point to the reenactment of this bill as an adequate or acceptable basis for an agreement with respect to the administration's aid request for the next fiscal year. This does not serve the purpose for which it was intended in the past. It will clearly not serve the purpose for which it was intended in the future. We are going to need a new formulation which is more effective and acceptable.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Nevada (Mrs. VUCANOVICH).

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, it looks like the Congress may have reached an all time high in promoting activity for activity's sake. Today, we consider H.R. 4656, a bill that serves only as a reminder to the Congress that it must do what it has already charged itself with doing, considering the issue of human rights certification in El Salvador prior to the end of the current fiscal year. That makes consideration of this bill unnecessary and a waste of taxpayer's money.

But, more importantly, consideration of this resolution represents a squandering of valuable time when the Congress should be dealing with legislation demanded by our people. I'm talking about consideration of meaningful and needed legislation like the line item veto, the balanced budget amendment, bankruptcy law reform, immigration reform, or any of a number of other important legislative matters.

With that in mind, I ask two things from my colleagues here today. First, defeat this meaningless resolution and avoid the damaging partisanship that it will impose upon our foreign policy. And second, whatever your individual decision on this resolution, let us pass our judgment now, as quickly as possible, and not waste any more of our time.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MARKEY).

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4656.

I do not believe there is a Member of this House who could in good conscience oppose this bill.

H.R. 4656 conditions U.S. aid on reform and respect for human rights in El Salvador. But when we talk about human rights in El Salvador, what we are talking about is torture and murder.

More than 30,000 people have been murdered in El Salvador since 1979. Most of them were killed by their own Government and its allied death squads.

This is the same Government to which our country gave $1 billion worth of guns and money in the last few years. And the same Government to which the administration now wants to give another $1 billion or $2 billion.

Making progress in human rights is the least we can ask of the Salvadoran Government. But they are thumbing their noses at us. The members of the Salvadoran security forces who raped and murdered American nuns have gone unpunished. No death squad member has been convicted for any of the thousands of murders in El Salvador. And land reform is under attack.

Requiring human rights certification is simple moral decency.

It is also intelligent foreign policy, because a Salvadoran Government that does not respect the rights of its people cannot retain the support of its people.

Congress should have no trouble passing this bill. We should not even be debating this bill.

But last November, President Reagan gave a pocket veto to a bill with this very language. What does that say?

Does it say that only Congress is serious about human rights in El Salvador?

Does it say that President Reagan's newfound opposition to death squads is limited to words, not deeds?

Does it say that the administration will let nothing stand in the way of a military solution in El Salvador?

The President talks about a bipartisan foreign policy. And he set up the Kissinger Commission to achieve this bipartisan foreign policy.

But where was the President's commitment to a bipartisan foreign policy when he vetoed the certification bill last November?

President Reagan's own bipartisan Commission on Central America has since urged passage of certification legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is indispensible, but it is not enough. It will help our foreign policy officials prod the Salvadorans toward reform.

But meanwhile, the whole Central American region is on the brink of war.

If we do not force the administration to abandon its strategy of military confrontation, we are just arguing about cabin assignments on the Titanic.

Mr. Speaker, the President has made it clear that he will not force the Salvadoran Government to respect human rights.

If he will not, Congress must.

I urge my colleagues to pass this bill, and then continue the fight for a peaceful, principled U.S. policy in Central America.

□ 1320

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE).

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, it is mindboggling the way numbers get thrown around down here just randomly. We heard 38,000 deaths attributed all to the rightwing death squads yesterday at committee hearings. Today the ante has been raised to 50,000 by the gentleman from the People's Republic of Massachusetts.

I would suggest that the numbers go the other way. And I just do not know whether their computers are working or not on the liberal side of the aisle, but the statistics show that civilian deaths attributable to political violence have been going down steadily by anybody's count. Here are the Embassy's figures, here are the figure from the other sources, including Tutela Legal. They are going down.

It just seems to me if they cannot count they ought to at least have a proper sense of direction.

Now there have been three members of the Constituent Assembly murdered, I will grant that. And all three of them are from the rightwing ARENA Party, but I guess that does not count.

Now I heard the gentleman from North Dakota say we should give more aid to people and not to the government. We are embracing the wrong authority.

Well, the problem with giving the aid to the people is the Communists blow it up. They blow up the bridges, and the power stations, and all of the infrastructure. So unless you have some military to surround the infrastructure, you may as well set fire to the money and let it go up in smoke. You must protect your investment with military aid. That is the reality. That is called getting mugged by reality. That is the way it is down there.

I have heard the same voices perhaps coming out of different people, but the sound is the same, the melody is the same, that we have to have a government down there that is immune, that is making progress on the issue of human rights.

The Shah of Iran was certainly a bad example. And so we immunized ourselves from any taint over there. And you know what we got? I do not have to tell the Members what we got; we got something far worse.

Now the perfect is the enemy of the good. The consequence of enforcing what you want is to turn the 5 million bleeding, suffering people of El Salvador over to those wonderful, warm Marxist-Leninists. That, it seems to me, is not helpful to the cause of human rights.

I could support this if we would do it to all of the countries to whom we ladle out foreign aid. But we zero in on one little country that has a very bloody, brutal insurrection going on and we demand that human rights progress be shown. Well, maybe it cannot be shown. Maybe it is difficult for this period and maybe it will happen in this period. But you cut off military aid guaranteeing a Communist victory. Then you say, my goodness, what a terrible thing.

Well, would it not be awful if in revenue sharing to the local governments we had to certify that human rights conditions were improving? I note with some interest in the New York Times of this month, February 3, that Newark, N.J., has been sued by the Justice Department charged with egregious and flagrant, unconstitutional conditions in the city's jails.

Now, I will not spoil the Members' lunch hour reading what is going on in the jails of Newark, which is the home of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I would not do that to the Members because that is the way things are. It is tough in Newark, N.J.

Let us move over to the place where the gentleman from Brooklyn who just spoke with such punctiliousness about human rights in El Salvador. His area of expertise, the People's Republic of China. We regularly receive mail from him urging increased trade and we removed trade barriers.

Now I am in receipt of a letter from a gentlelady from Connecticut urging we all send a letter to the President of the People's Republic of China complaining about 5,000 executions, without trial, or at least without indictment. Executions decreed by administrative order; 100,000 citizens arrested and banished to remote labor camps.

Why, I bet you that was never brought up when the Prime Minister was over here visiting and sipping tea with everybody.

Now here is Time magazine, January 16.

Hypocrisy reigns supreme.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ECKART).

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, I could not help but be chagrined by the previous speaker's statements. Of course we expect the death numbers to go down. There are less people to kill in El Salvador with each succeeding month.

And I would love for the people of El Salvador to have the same opportunity as those in Newark, N.J., to file a suit to seek to protect their constitutional rights. For, if they tried to do that in El Salvador, they would find the courts closed. They would find no constitution there to protect their rights.

Hypocrisy, indeed, is a fun word to bandy about. And perhaps what we are doing in the course of the conduct of our foreign aid is to try to assert through what this legislation presents to us today as an opportunity of the American people, the taxpayers, who will pay both financially and in some instances, personally, for the consequences of this foreign policy of this administration or any future administration.

A foreign policy that does not enjoy the support of the American people is doomed to fail. It will fail because it is intrinsically weak at home.

This certification process, albeit a feeble one, and one which many of us would assume would like to be stronger, preserves the rights and the prerogatives of this House as the elected representatives of the taxpayers, the financers of the foreign policy initiatives of this administration, to have them come back to us and to justify what they are doing with the American taxpayers' dollars.

The proposal that we have before us is not a small step, but a giant leap. A giant leap for those of us who believe in the conduct of foreign policy based on the fundamental principles that founded, not the Government of El Salvador, but the Government of the United States of America.

If we believe those principles are as strong today as they were 200 years ago, then the adoption of this resolution is critical and important.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MOLINARI).

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I listened with intent to the debate so far today and the scale that was submitted by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE) shows a sharp drop since 1981 to today in the civilian deaths attributable to political violence.

I think it is no coincidence that in fiscal year 1981, that is when we first brought into being the certification process. And I think that we cannot overlook the fact that maybe that is one of the reasons why we have seen such a sharp drop in the violence in El Salvador.

And for that reason I am going to support this measure.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments in closing.

It is interesting to note that the last American killed in El Salvador was killed by the guerrillas.

□ 1330

Mention was made during the debate about the decision or opinion of Judge Tyler. I have been informed by the administration that they would very much like to release the statement and finding and investigative report of Judge Tyler because it shows in very strong language the efforts the administration has made to get the case to trial.

However, to do so might very well jeopardize the case itself, and I think that is what we should be concerned with.

I would point out also that, contrary to what has been said by some people on the other side of the aisle, at least the implication they gave, we are providing three times as much economic aid as military aid.

Also interesting, during the period of 1979 to 1983, U.S. economic assistance has totaled $607 million, while the guerrilla cost to the economy, the value of what the guerrillas have destroyed in the economy, exceeds $826 million.

So I think we should keep our eye on the program here, Mr. Speaker. While I support this resolution today, I do feel that there are much better ways of bringing about the objectives that we all seek.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, just in closing, let me thank my friend and colleague, the ranking Republican on the subcommittee, the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO), for his comments today, his support of this resolution.

As was indicated at the outset, this ought to be regarded as relatively routine. The House has passed this bill twice before. In fact, the last time it was passed by unanimous consent. There was no opposition to it in the House.

I would hope that we could again today see an overwhelming vote of support for the bill as an indication of continuing concern in the United States about the issues that are delineated, the criteria that are delineated in the bill. I will not describe them again. The Members are very familiar with it.

I urge a vote in favor of the bill.

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4656, a bill which would make aid to El Salvador contingent on a certification by the President that progress is being made in that nation on human rights.

This Nation has committed more than $1 billion to El Salvador since 1979, nearly a third of that for military aid. During that same period, some 35,000 noncombatant civilians have been killed by Salvadoran Government forces and rightwing death squads. The seriousness of the situation prompted Congress in 1981 to require the President to certify every 6 months that progress was being made by that government in the area of human rights. When that law expired late last year, Congress approved H.R. 4042, a measure which placed further conditions on El Salvador aid. Specifically, the President was required to certify that the Salvadoran Government was improving its human rights record, carrying out land reforms and investigating the murders of American citizens in that nation, including the deaths of four American churchwomen.

While this Congress was in recess, President Reagan vetoed this measure. The administration now appears ready to request $150 million more in military aid in fiscal 1984, this in addition to the $68.4 million already approved by the Congress.

This Congress cannot allow aid to El Salvador to continue without some move toward reversing the reign of terror instituted by forces alien to democracy. At this point, it is worthwhile to recall the advice of the President's own National Bipartisan Commission on Central America. The so-called Kissinger Commission said in its report:

Military aid should, through legislation requiring periodic reports, be made contingent upon demonstrated progress toward free elections; freedom of association; the establishment of rule of law and an effective judicial system; and the termination of the activities of the so-called death squads, as well as vigorous action against those guilty of crimes and the prosecution to the extent possible of past offenders. These conditions should be seriously enforced.

These conditions will not be enforced, I would suggest, by an administration which vetoes congressional legislation which would give the force of law to the recommendations of the Kissinger Commission and others. If we are to encourage action on human rights in El Salvador, we must pass the measure now before us and, if it is vetoed once again by the President, we must be ready to override that veto.

Mr. Speaker, by the admission of the Secretary of State, Mr. George Shultz, we know that conditions in El Salvador threaten the lives of civilians. In testimony before the House Appropriations Foreign Operations Subcommittee on March 16, 1983, he noted that "political violence against noncombatants remains a serious problem." He also acknowledged that "little progress has yet been made in rebuilding a judicial system free from intimidation and coercion."

There are other sources of information which lay the blame for many civilian deaths squarely at the feet of the Salvadoran Government. The Archdiocese of San Salvador reports that during the first 6 months of 1983, murders of civilians by Government forces and paramilitary groups alined with the government totaled 2,527.

The violence against civilians continues. In a recent report by the American Civil Liberties Union Americas Watch, Fermin Garcia Guardado, a member of the ACOINS cooperative in the village of Las Hojas, described a massacre of cooperative workers by government forces on February 22, 1983.

On that day, Mr. Guardado recounts, some 200 uniformed soldiers from the Jaguar Battalion of the Sonsonate garrison arrived at the village. The leader of the soldiers, at the direction of three men with covered faces, took from the cooperative seven men who were denounced as subversives by these faceless accusers.

When Guardado and others went to the Garrison's headquarters in Sonsonate to inquire about the status of their friends, they were told by the garrison commander that no report had been filed on the incident. This led them to search for what they feared would be corpses. Their fears were justified. One kilometer from the cooperative they found them. Mr. Guardado described the scene this way:

All of them had their heads destroyed by shots and their thumbs twisted, some to the back, others to the front. Among them was my son I mentioned earlier. We found the bodies at 1 p.m. and besides the corpses of the members of the cooperative, also there were bodies of 10 unknown to us between 20 and 40 years old.

Mr. Guardado was later informed by the garrison commander that the people who were killed, which the commander said numbered only four, died because they were subversives.

Amnesty International has documented the complicity of the El Salvador Government in the killing of civilians. In its 1983 report, the organization said:

Amnesty International believed that all branches of the security forces including the paramilitary civilian defense groups under military control and newly trained counter-insurgency battalions, were involved in a systematic and widespread program of torture, abduction and individual and mass killings of men, women and children. The victims of government violence included people of suspected opposition to the authorities from all sectors of society. They also included residents in areas targeted for security operations whose killing or mutilation appeared to have been completely arbitrary. Amnesty International was also investigating the reasons for arrest of the several hundred political prisoners held in El Salvador, and their reasons for imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, the violations of human rights by the Government of El Salvador are both blatant and continuous. By increasing military aid to this nation, while asking for no change in the Salvadoran Government's policies, I believe we actually encourage such abuse of rights by those now in power. By demanding that conditions be met before aid is allowed to continue, we can begin to reverse the cycle of terror that has swept that nation.

I urge a "yes" vote on H.R. 4656, a measure which is identical to the bill which the President vetoed in November.●

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support passage of H.R. 4656, which would extend the statutory requirement that U.S. military assistance to El Salvador be conditioned on progress in the area of human rights.

The Catholic Church in El Salvador estimates that 45,000 civilians have been murdered by Government security forces and death squads since 1979—that is 1 percent of the Salvadoran population. Consider what our reaction would be if 1 percent of the U.S. population were murdered in a 4-year period—that would be 2.4 million Americans killed.

It is incredible to me that all this administration dares to ask in the way of human rights progress is that the murders per month by Government forces decrease, and those responsible be given other jobs. What would we say if a mass murderer in the United States was given as punishment an overseas assignment or a lateral transfer? I liked Richard Cohen's pointed comment in a recent Washington Post editorial referring to the reassignment of Salvadoran military officers linked to the death squads, "Salvadoran justice can be brutal."

Administration rhetoric not withstanding, the President has completely ignored the human rights process, and will certify "progress" on the most contrived pretext. Nevertheless, we should keep up the pressure in any way we can on both our own Government and the Salvadoran Government on the matter of human rights. We must keep the diplomatic heat on by requiring verifiable progress in human rights, land reform, free elections, and investigation of the murders of the four American women. We must be more vigilant in seeing that our food aid and economic aid are not abused. We should withhold financial assistance of all kinds unless and until there is a government worth supporting in El Salvador. There will be no hope at all if Congress throws in the towel and abdicates its responsibilities in this matter.●

● Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, I support H.R. 4656 making aid to El Salvador contingent on the President certifying to the Congress every 6 months that the Salvadoran Government is making progress in protecting human rights, implementing land reform and guaranteeing free elections. This certification process has certainly not been the effective check Congress intended it to be, but it is one of several steps that must be taken to assure public support for aid to El Salvador.

In recent weeks the Reagan administration finally notified the Government of El Salvador that the right-wing death squads had to be stopped. Those squads are terrorizing Salvadorans who seek change in the social and political conditions that have existed.

Yet such change must occur. The Kissinger Commission report makes it clear that change is not only just, but also critical to the success of efforts to fight Marxist aided guerrillas.

The death squads have been linked to military and civilian officials of the Government. The United States should not support a government which tolerates, if not encourages, such terror; the American people will not accept it morally. The death squads undermine the ability of the Salvadoran Government to win the hearts and minds of its people. They undermine the legitimacy and credibility of American policy in the eyes of our allies and the Third World. They must be stopped.

Over the last 3 years many U.S. officials including former Ambassadors to El Salvador have tried to convince the Reagan administration to protest vigorously the failure of the Salvadoran Government to suppress this terror. Until now the administration's policy appears to have been one of indifference.

I hope the administration now plans to bring every possible pressure to bear on the Salvadoran leadership to stop the death squads. The administration's past indifference however, requires it to prove to Congress as well as to the Salvadoran Government that it means business. One step forward for the administration would be to reverse its stand on the legislation before us—accept the certification process and seriously pursue the intent of its policy.

Mr. Speaker, we can and should work to build a bipartisan policy to meet the serious challenge in Central America. But if we are to achieve anything like the commitment called for in the Commission report, many Americans will have to be assured that the regimes we support are pursuing the goals of economic justice and the rule of law.

Mr. Speaker, it would be naive for us to expect El Salvador, in the midst of civil war to meet the same standards of civil rights which we expect for ourselves. In fact, even with our affluence and long tradition of civil liberties, we have difficulty meeting the standards we profess. But at the same time we cannot ignore the persistent use of terror by the death squads—terror which violates all we claim to be working for—terror which alienates the people whose support the Government needs—terror which frustrates the social change critical to longer term justice and stability.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of H.R. 4656, I want to express my enthusiastic support of this vital legislation which would "continue in effect the current certification requirements with respect to El Salvador until the Congress enacts new legislation providing conditions for U.S. military assistance to El Salvador or until the end of fiscal year 1984, whichever occurs first."

I also want to commend my distinguished colleagues, Congressman MICHAEL BARNES, chairman of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, and Congressman DANTE FASCELL, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for providing the leadership in bringing this important legislation to the floor.

H.R. 4656 would provide needed leverage in our dealings with the Salvadoran military and security forces and with the oligarchy which refuses to make the necessary reforms crucial to our national interest in the areas of human rights and democratization.

Since 1979, nearly 35,000 civilians have been killed by death squads comprised of military and police personnel fueled by rightwing extremists. During the same period, the people whom we represent, the American taxpayers, have provided nearly $1 billion in aid. I am confident that the American people want us to speak forcibly and concretely in requiring a quid pro quo relationship on aid and human rights in reference to El Salvador. Without conditionality on aid based upon human rights performance, it is unlikely that the Government of El Salvador will do anything to bring to justice the murderers who continue to savage the people of El Salvador and who have been responsible for the murders of American citizens. The Department of State needs this weapon of conditionality because it is the only tangible leverage they have in pressuring the Government of El Salvador to curb the violence.

Whether we are dealing with the Soviet Union, South Africa, Haiti, El Salvador, or any other country which has a demonstrated pattern and practice of human rights violations, we must speak very specifically on the conditions which will define our aid and trade relationships. We must use all the nonviolent means at our disposal to bring about the change which is vital to a more secure and just world. Without this effort, we will see more injustice, more chaos, and more violence. We can make a difference and we have the moral and political responsibility to do so.

Let us pass H.R. 4656 and put in place a policy which is as good as the American people.●

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, in 1959 then U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. Henry Cabot Lodge lamented to an Eisenhower Cabinet meeting that "the United States can win wars—but the question is can we win revolutions."

Today we again confront in El Salvador the tragic consequences of that question—too often unanswered and, in recent years, too often wrongly answered. The harsh reality is that, like too many of its predecessors in dealing with Central America, this administration seeks to impose a military solution to complex problems that are social, economic, and political in origin, and which must be resolved in those contexts.

Today we are again called upon in H.R. 4656 to reconfirm what this House previously ordained in H.R. 4042—namely, to link any form of aid to the present Government in El Salvador to the certification by this administration that substantive improvements have been made by the present Government in El Salvador in curbing human rights abuses against its own citizens.

Regrettably, the record clearly indicates two pertinent facts relevant to our consideration. First, there has been a documented increase, not a decrease, in the activities of the death squads in recent months, especially in the vicious and murderous actions of the Maximiliano Hernandez Anti-Communist Brigade. In addition, recent testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee by Mr. Robert White, the former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador, further documents the close working relationship between rightwing Salvadoran exiles living in Florida and the leaders of the death squads in El Salvador, including those responsible for the March 24, 1980, assassination of Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero, the Catholic primate of El Salvador, as he was saying Mass.

Second, this administration has repeatedly made clear its disdain for the broad issue of human rights, and especially for the situation in El Salvador. The President's cavalier action in pocket-vetoing the legislative predecessor of this bill is a clear indication that, not only does he disapprove of the intent of this legislation, but that he also has no intention of enforcing its provisions should it be passed over his veto.

I urge my colleagues to vote for this legislation and to work for its full implementation immediately upon passage. We have a moral obligation to the people of El Salvador to end the bloody strife there and to work for a negotiated solution which includes all parties to the struggle.●

● Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this certification legislation, and wish to thank Congressman MIKE BARNES for his special efforts in keeping the human rights issue before both the administration and the American people.

I am convinced that if it were not for the biannual certification requirement Congress has imposed on the administration in order to allow more military aid for El Salvador, there would be no effort by this administration to focus on past and present human rights abuses in that country.

I can speak specifically to the State Department's role in pursuing the case of the four religious workers who were murdered in El Salvador in December 1980. To this day, none of the men implicated in this brutal crime has been tried. Nevertheless, the twice yearly certification requirement has forced the State Department and Salvadoran officials to make some effort to resolve this case.

In fact, just last week, just as this bill was being put on the House schedule, the State Department finally decided to allow the attorneys representing the families of the four murdered women to review the Tyler report, which studies the efforts to resolve these murders.

The families of the murdered women—and I represent a brother of one of the four victims—believe the State Department and Salvadoran authorities would rather forget this case than pursue it.

I think that is simply wrong, and it is a sorry indicator of the lack of regard our current Central American policy has for the value of human rights and human lives.

We need this certification requirement, Mr. Speaker, if only to force the administration to pay attention to human rights in El Salvador at least twice a year. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in firm support of the legislation (H.R. 4656) to extend current certification requirements with regard to conditions on U.S. military assistance to the Government of El Salvador. As an original cosponsor of this legislation, I would like to take this opportunity to join this important debate on present U.S. policy toward that nation and toward Central America in general.

The President's cynical pocket veto of legislation (H.R. 4042) to extend the 1981 human rights certification process for El Salvador bespeaks the gravity of the threat to U.S.-supported reforms posed by the recent upsurge of rightwing political terror in that country. Recent news photos of the grisly toll of El Salvador's political violence have brought home the impotence of present U.S. policy to halt the killing and promote lasting reform.

That the veto was invoked during the Christmas holidays—thereby preventing a possible override—underscores the insensitivity of the White House toward congressional efforts to insure that our Nation's historic commitment to human rights is reflected in our foreign relations. With regard to this latter point, I applaud the efforts of my colleagues in challenging the constitutionality of the President's action in court.

Mr. Speaker, today's debate is particularly relevant in light of the President's recent endorsement of the recommendations presented by his Bipartisan Commission on Central America. As my colleagues are aware, that Commission, headed by Henry A. Kissinger, called for a major increase in U.S. involvement in the region. Congress will be asked shortly to approve a downpayment on the Commission's recommended $8.4 billion military and economic aid package. It is, therefore, essential that we take this opportunity to spell out our objectives in the region and how U.S. assistance will contribute to their realization.

Since 1979 the United States has extended nearly a billion dollars in economic and military aid to the Government of El Salvador. From that time to the present, a growing body of evidence has come to light which links the mysterious murders of Salvadoran civilians to forces allied to that country's military. A pattern has emerged whereby these rightist death squads have used terror as a weapon to forestall economic reform and block negotiations with leftist guerrillas to bring an end to El Salvador's 4-year-old civil war.

These acts of terror have, to be sure, been decried by officials both within the State Department and the White House. Yet the record of U.S. policy presents quite a different picture. Rather than pursue an end to the fighting in El Salvador through political reform, the administration has spent hundreds of millions of dollars training and equipping Salvadoran security forces in the hope of achieving a military victory over the leftist forces. In so doing, the administration has accepted with little more than perfunctory opposition the indiscriminate violence of rightwing groups—even when members of the Salvadoran security forces have been implicated in the murders of U.S. citizens, as in the still unresolved murders of four American churchwomen and two labor officials. In effect, the administration has not only tolerated such atrocities, but had supplied the very materials—U.S. military aid—which provide focus and purpose to their continuation.

The veto of legislation making U.S. military assistance contingent upon progress in human rights sends a terrible signal that this country is willing to tolerate death squad violence as a price that must be paid in the more important struggle against leftist guerrillas. Even the Kissinger Commission concluded that increased pressure to safeguard human rights is essential to ending the strife in El Salvador.

Mr. Speaker, the United States must not continue to accept this murderous atmosphere in El Salvador. Faced with the possible ascension of reputed death squad leader Roberto D'Aubuisson and his Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA) to power, it is vital that we spell out in no uncertain terms our unshakable commitment to meaningful reform in El Salvador.

The President's supplemental request for fiscal 1984 foreign aid programs is expected to include over $300 million for the Government of El Salvador. This is in addition to the $64.8 million military and the $161.3 million economic assistance already appropriated for that country. If U.S. foreign assistance is to address constructively the problems of El Salvador, it must be structured to encourage the development of democratic institutions that are responsive to the needs of the Salvadoran people. At a minimum, continued aid must be tied to key U.S. policy goals including programs in land reform, the protection of human rights, and political negotiations toward the resolution of the present conflict—as would be required with passage of H.R. 4556.

On a broader scale, the primary emphasis of U.S. policy toward Central America must be shifted from military confrontation to negotiated settlement. The United States should take up the regional peace proposals put forth by the four-nation Contadora Group, and should work diligently toward the realization of those goals. We must act now—before the elements of either the violent right or left are on the verge of military victory—to forestall radicalism and the instability it fosters.

For these reasons, I urge in the strongest terms my colleagues to join today in reaffirming our commitment to human rights by approving the pending legislation.●

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, human rights is not an abstract phrase, it is not a philosophy that can be divorced from U.S. political and economic objectives anywhere in the world. Human rights is the basic ingredient for democratic reform and stability in nations across the globe.

In El Salvador more than 30,000 civilians have been murdered by death squads over the past 3 years and not one person has been brought to trial. In El Salvador members of labor organizations, media, and political parties are openly threatened for speaking out against abuses by the armed forces. In El Salvador farmers who band together in land co-ops are murdered. In El Salvador students and professors who debate these and other issues simply disappear.

Yet El Salvador is one of the top five targets of U.S. military and economic aid. Over the past 3 years, as casualties have mounted, Congress has approved steady increases in the supply of military hardware to this country.

This is a policy doomed to failure. No government can survive unless it honors basic human rights. If we insist on backing such regimes, it will simply be a matter of time until the United States is left holding the bag, harming our interests in Central America for years to come.

That is why it is absolutely essential that Congress pass legislation today mandating periodic certifications of human rights improvement in El Salvador.

President Reagan, who has vetoed this bill once already, cites congressional action as a major obstacle in the fight for human rights in El Salvador. To his way of thinking, certification ties the hands of the administration by calling for evidence on human rights violations and the steps the Salvadoran Government is taking to correct them.

Pointing to recent speeches by Ambassador Pickering and Vice President BUSH which condemn the death squads, members of the administration assert that they are taking care of the problem.

Good stuff, but unless the administration backs its statements up with actions, the Salvadoran Government has no reason to change. Occasional statements of concern, just as twice yearly certifications, are no substitute for a consistent policy that mandates improvement in human rights as a condition for U.S. aid.

And the administration, seeking success on the battlefield instead of the bargaining table, will not take this step.

The most significant action affecting human rights in El Salvador in recent months has been the administration's request for $179 million in additional military aid.

The Salvadoran Government knows that U.S. military aid will continue no matter how high the body count. As Carlos Fuentes stated in a recent article in Harper's Magazine.

> . . . The Salvadoran army does not want victory. That would mean the end of American aid. It does not want successful negotiations for the same reason. In effect, the United States has become the captive of the Salvadoran military, not the other way around.

The bottom line is that certification makes the administration edgy because it sets standards of improvement and holds open the threat that U.S. military aid will stop unless these standards are met.

Unless Congress passes legislative standards, the administration will provide selective evidence to make the case for additional aid. The recent report on human rights conditions, submitted in lieu of certification, proves this point. The report reads more like a public relations brochure than an investigative document.

In order to document the human rights situation, the administration relies on numbers compiled by the U.S. Embassy in El Salvador, numbers gleaned solely from reports in the newspapers and from information provided by the Salvadoran Armed Forces. As a member of the U.S. Embassy in El Salvador stated:

> We do not attempt to take personal testimony from relatives or question the information given to us by the Armed Forces.

The problems with this approach are obvious. The Embassy sets the number of murders and disappearances at 1,677 for 1983. The Archdiocese of San Salvador which uses a much more stringent method of investigation, sets the total at 5,142. Socorro Juridico, an independent human rights organization, sets the total at 5,670.

Either way, to continue to trust millions of dollars of U.S. military aid to a government unable to protect its own citizens is a mistake of the grossest kind.

I support the certification legislation as a first step, though I am concerned that the legislation contains no mechanism to overriding an administrative certification and turning off the aid spigot. I would hope that tighter standards will be drafted later this year.●

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I support H.R. 4656 because, although imperfect, the certification process is one definable way that Congress can force the President to reevaluate its policy toward El Salvador. I do not believe that the administration will make the same demands of itself that Congress will make of it. That is why periodic reports from the State Department are not adequate for assessing the state of affairs in El Salvador.

There has been an emphasis on a military solution to Salvador's present crisis. The escalation in military aid over the past 3 years will bear me out on this point. Yet, I am at a loss to find something positive resulting from this escalation.

The agonizing process of bringing to justice the killers of the American churchwomen and labor advisers continues. The terror brought on by death squads continues. The poor showing of the Salvadoran Army, despite a large amount of financial aid, continues, and the land reform program is still encountering great resistance. No wonder the President does not want a certification process.

What remains in El Salvador is the continued deterioration of that nation's economy, society, and more important—its spirit. There is within our own country a distinct lack of support by many Americans for a failed policy. We can institute as many studies as we want, but the results will be the same: the present tactics of this administration in El Salvador are not succeeding.

I want a certification process because I believe that the President must be faced with the reality of the situation in El Salvador. He does not like to have to make a public show of support, while privately slapping the hands of Salvadoran leaders.

I do not blame him. It hurts his credibility. The simplest solution would, therefore, be for us to pass H.R. 4656, reinstating the certification process. Then, the next time the President is faced with the question of whether or not to certify El Salvador, perhaps he would take the risk and not certify. Maybe this would force the Salvadoran Government to make some necessary changes. Even better, maybe all concerned parties would see the need to engage in a dialog.●

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4656, a bill to reauthorize the Presidential certification on conditions in El Salvador.

As a cosponsor of this legislation, I was disappointed when the President pocket vetoed this measure during the last session. H.R. 4656 would simply reinstitute, for 1 year, the semiannual certification requirements that expired at the end of fiscal year 1983. Since this reporting mechanism was first enacted in 1981, the President has made four certifications that the Salvadoran Government is attempting to safeguard human rights and implement economic and political reforms.

Despite the President's positive certification, the record of the Salvadoran Government remains questionable. The human rights monitoring group for the Archdiocese of San Salvador, Tutela Legal, has estimated that during the last 6 months of 1983 over 2,500 Salvadoran civilians were murdered by Government forces and paramilitary groups allied to them. This group also documented 209 disappearances of Salvadoran citizens during this same time period, a decrease from last year. There have also been reports of illegal evictions and violence against citizens involved in the land reform program.

I am, however, particularly concerned with the stalling and delays associated with the investigation and trial of those accused of killing four American churchwomen. The record on this case, Mr. Speaker, is dismal.

On December 2, 1980—over 3 years ago—four American citizens were abducted at El Salvador's International Airport and killed later that evening presumably by members of the Salvadoran National Guard. In May 1981, six low-ranking guardsmen were detained for the murders of the four U.S. churchwomen. Since February 1982, a criminal case has been pending against five of them. Members of Congress and administration officials have been assured since then that a trial date would be set "in the near future." All of these assurances have come and gone, and one disturbing fact remains. Four American citizens were murdered 3 years ago in El Salvador, a strong ally of the United States, possibly by Salvadoran military.

Although I support this legislation, I am not convinced that this certification process has achieved its goals or is the best way to conduct our foreign policy, and I think many of my colleagues would agree. However, for El Salvador—a country with a questionable human rights record—there must be a significant and meaningful incentive for this regime to respect the human rights of Salvadoran nationals and American citizens in that country. In addition, if the United States is going to pour millions of dollars into El Salvador, there must be long-term political and economic reforms. Our Government has recognized for some time that human rights considerations are a part of our foreign policy objectives. We do not hesitate to highlight the plight of Soviet Jews. We abhor the racial policies of the South African Government, and we publicly criticize the overt oppression of political activists and freedom fighters in Cuba. If our policy is to be effective and credible, we must be consistent.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 4656.●

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4656, a bill to make continued U.S. aid to El Salvador contingent upon the President certifying that the government of that country has made progress in human rights, democratization, and land reform.

I would like to first take this opportunity to salute my colleague, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNES). As the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, Mr. BARNES has been the Congress conscience and guiding force as we examined the difficult circumstances surrounding U.S. involvement in El Salvador.

Mr. Speaker, in 1981, the Congress enacted the International Security Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-113). This legislation required that as a condition for continued military aid, the President must certify every 6 months the improvements in the human rights situation in that nation. The Presidential certification was to include an account of areas of concern such as the government's ability to control its armed forces and efforts to meet internationally recognized human rights standards. Additional and warranted points of consideration included the Salvadoran Government's ability to end the widespread torture and murder of citizens and the good faith efforts to investigate the 1980 and 1981 murders of U.S. citizens in El Salvador. This law met a specific need in an effective manner.

Public Law 97-113 expired on September 30, 1983. Congress, however, passed new legislation (H.R. 2042) in November 1983 to replace the expired law.

Despite the obvious will of Congress to renew this certification requirement, on November 30, 1983, President Reagan pocket vetoed H.R. 2042 while Congress was on its Christmas recess, thus assuring that Congress could not override his veto. This action is just another clear example of the President's unwillingness to cooperate with the Congress on foreign policy matters. More importantly, it underscores Mr. Reagan's refusal to force the government leaders of El Salvador to make progress in the areas of human rights, peace and justice.

In lieu of the certification requirement, the President has decided to "voluntarily" provide Congress with periodic reports on the situation in El Salvador. The Congress has received no voluntary reports to date. Judging from recent news reports on the upsurge of violence in that country, these progress reports may never come. Meanwhile, economic and military aid continues to flow to El Salvador.

Mr. Speaker, for nearly 4 years, the United States has poured massive amounts of economic and military assistance into El Salvador. Yet, Salvadoran Government leaders continue to act without respect for human rights, human decency, or the standards established by the Congress in the International Security and Development Act. According to the El Salvador Human Rights Commission, the "notorious" death squads have killed an estimated 40,000 people during the past years, including 9 Americans. Short of cutting off all aid to El Salvador, the certification process has been the only mechanism to monitor and insure at least minimal, progress in human rights and political and economic reforms.

No one would argue that the certification process has meant an immediate end to the death squads, nor has it meant vast improvements in the political and economic policies of El Salvador. It has, however, placed pressure on the government leaders to make continued progress in these areas or face the termination of U.S. aid. Without this pressure, this true incentive, leaders of El Salvador will again revert to the blatantly violent activities of the past.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it seems ironic that President Reagan would dismiss the certification process because he feels it places excessive constraints on his foreign policy when his own national bipartisan Commission on Central America (the Kissinger Commission) strongly endorses the certification procedures and continued conditions on aid to El Salvador. The Kissinger Commission reported that—

With respect to El Salvador, military aid should, through legislation requiring periodic reports, be made contingent upon demonstrated progress toward free elections; freedom of association; the establishment of the rule of the law and effective judicial system; and the termination of the activities of the so-called death squads, as well as vigorous action against those guilty of crimes and the prosecution to the extent possible of past offenders. The conditions should be seriously enforced.

President Reagan need only review the recommendations of his own Commission to see the merit and necessity of the certification process. By failing to listen to Congress and the Kissinger Commission, Mr. Reagan is acting irresponsibly. We cannot allow this to continue.

Mr. Speaker, as Members of this body, the American people have entrusted in us the immense responsibility of appropriating their tax dollars. This responsibility means more than just allocating resources. It also means that we must insure that every tax dollar spent is used for its intended purpose. The provisions included in H.R. 4656 will enable the Congress to fulfill this responsibility.

Moreover, certification is the only way to assure Congress a role in setting conditions on aid to El Salvador. There will be no improvements in the human rights situation in El Salvador unless U.S. aid is made contingent upon meeting the conditions set forth in this legislation.

We cannot in good conscience stand by and see U.S. military assistance poured into a nation that on its own has not demonstrated any willingness to reform its policies. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of H.R. 4656.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, Today we will vote on H.R. 4656, which would reinact the certification process for aid to El Salvador. I am an original cosponsor of this bill.

In 1981, Congress enacted legislation which made continued aid to El Salvador contingent upon Presidential certification every 6 months that the Government of El Salvador was making progress in a number of human rights areas. This law expired on September 30, 1983.

In November, Congress passed by voice vote H.R. 4042, identical to the bill we are voting on today, to replace the expired 1981 law. This bill would have made aid to El Salvador again contingent upon Presidential certification that the Salvadoran Government is improving its human rights record, is working to implement land reform programs, is committed to free elections, and is actively investigating the murders of four American churchwomen and other U.S. citizens.

Mr. Speaker, everyone here in this house is aware of the many human rights violations and injustices practiced by the Government of El Salvador. We have all received reports of the violent acts of the right wing death squads, the deterioration of the land reform programs, the immense number of noncombatant civilians which have been killed.

On November 30, 1983, President Reagan vetoed H.R. 4042. To many, this veto was a signal by the President that the United States would not stand in the way of these oppressive and violent activities which the Salvadoran Government has participated in.

I feel strongly that our Central American neighbors need our help. They have been deeply hurt by the recent recession, their industry and technology is below what is needed to compete in the international market place, their standards of living could be improved with increased education. For these reasons I have supported economic and developmental aid to this region.

However, I feel we must not blindly send assistance without reassurance that it will be put to good use. I can not justify in my own mind supporting a government with out considering its willingness to improve its basic human rights practices. Without H.R. 4656, we will be doing just that.

I urge my colleagues to again send this legislation to the President. Through our determined passage of this bill, let us make our message loud and clear. We will not ignore blatant infringements upon the basic rights of the Salvadoran people, and we will not participate in these violations by unconditional support of the Government of El Salvador.●

● Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, there are good reasons why we should not pass this bill today, and none of them abrogate human rights, which all of us support.

Let everyone recognize that this is purely a political exercise we are engaged in today. The Barnes resolution (H.R. 4042) was to have retained its version of certification only until September 30, 1984, or such time as Congress passed new legislation addressing military aid to El Salvador. Well, the continuing appropriations resolution for fiscal year 1984 is that new legislation. It requires certification of progress in land reform and a verdict in the churchwomen's case before all of the current military assistance to El Salvador can be spent. So we have certification requirements, regardless of what we do today.

The bill before us today is targeted only at the democratically elected Salvadoran Government and not at the Marxist guerrillas who are trying to overthrow it. In short, we are selectively perpetrating a classic double standard—again.

The bill singles out a pro-Western ally, while ignoring the human rights violations of the Cubas, Nicaraguas, and Soviet Unions of this world. They are the greatest repressors of human rights in the world, and it is idiocy for us to disregard them as we do here today.

Mr. Speaker, the best reason not to pass this bill is that the administration's policy on El Salvador, which I support, is truly committed to human rights. We have supported free elections, trained Salvadoran troops in order to reduce the potential for human rights violations, and required dismissal of suspected death squad members in the miltary and the security force of the Salvadoran Constituent Assembly. Also, this past January 25, the administration certified to Congress that land reform in El Salvador is continuing, and that beneficiaries of the program have not been deprived of their rights.

Finally, conditional restriction of aid to El Salvador will do little to improve human rights in that country, but it may well lead to the collapse of the government there. And human rights have never been improved in any country that has fallen to the Communists. That is the risk of such zero-sum conditionality games; the increased likelihood that Castro's policy of extraterritorial subversion will succeed in Central America.

Let us continue to press the Salvadoran Government to do all it can to reduce human rights violations. Let us continue to supply the necessary military aid to end the human rights violations perpetrated by the violent left and the violent right. But, most important, let us adopt the recommendations of the Kissinger commission to defend our vital interests in our own backyard.

We should reject this idea of a tradeoff between human rights and our own legitimate hemispheric security interests. Both are vital.●

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, the Presidential human rights certification requirement covering the granting of military aid to certain governments has long been a flash point in relations between the Congress and executive branch. The President's decision of last November to pocket-veto this requirement regarding military aid to El Salvador has again brought this issue before the Congress. It is once again time for the Congress to reaffirm our country's commitment to promoting respect for human rights through our Nation's foreign policy.

Many of us who have been intimately involved with the certification process have often been disappointed with the results. We have seen administrations certify that progress is being made in protecting human rights in the face of continuing and serious violations. In its eagerness to obtain the maximum amount of military aid for El Salvador, we have watched the Reagan administration turn the certification process into a sham. While I support H.R. 4656 and will continue to support measures that link the provision of American military aid to respect for human rights, I believe it is time for a rethinking of the entire certification process.

It is my hope that when the Foreign Affairs Committee takes up the administration's fiscal years 1985 and 1984 supplemental foreign aid package, we will develop a procedure which restores credibility to the certification requirement. Among the elements we should be looking at are:

First quantifiable, explicit, and unambiguous certification conditions;

Second, a penalty for lack of progress on human rights that encourages the administration to press for positive movement, rather than render the entire certification process meaningless. One approach, employed by Congress in the recent fiscal year 1984 continuing resolution, would withhold a portion of U.S. military aid pending concrete action on specific abuses; and Third, retaining a role for the Congress in the process itself. Requiring positive congressional action on a certification would assure that it is not exclusively the opinion of the executive branch which determines whether a nation is respecting the fundamental rights of its citizens.

Until the Foreign Affairs Committee has developed such an approach, I believe passage of this legislation is an important step in reaffirming the strong commitment of the Congress and of the American people to promoting respect for human rights.●

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4656, which would require the President to certify to Congress that the human rights conditions in El Salvador have improved before the United States could spend further funds for military aid to that country. As an original cosponsor of this legislation, I am firmly committed to restoring the certification process. The President's attempt to virtually wipe out the human rights component of American policy toward El Salvador is incomprehensible and deserves repudiation by this Congress. It is difficult to understand why the President attempted to eliminate the certification, given the overwhelming support shown for this measure in both the House and Senate when identical legislation was passed before the recess in November.

Even if the President does not share the same commitment to human rights as the Congress and the American people, it is my hope that he will recognize that the support in this country for the certification process is indisputable. Further, the deterioration of human rights in El Salvador makes this legislation imperative. Abuses in El Salvador continue to worsen. According to the human rights monitoring office of the archbishop of San Salvador, 2,615 people were murdered by the Army, security forces, and paramilitary squads during the last 6 months of 1983, an increase over the first half of that year.

Furthermore, the murder of civilians is not the only violation of human rights in El Salvador. Let us not forget those who have been tortured, who have disappeared or who have been harassed by government forces. Since 1979, there have been close to 40,000 murders of innocent civilians. This is truly a shocking number. But what is even more shocking is that not one member of the Salvadoran Armed Forces has been convicted or even tried for murdering one of those 40,000 civilians. And, of course, we should also note that there has been precious little progress in the trial of the Salvadoran soldiers accused of murdering the three American nuns and the lay missionary. Recently, I had the opportunity to read through a chronology of events, prepared by the International Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, related to the murder of these four women. It is shocking, but not surprising, to see the extent of the dilatory maneuvers which have been utilized in the attempt to prevent justice from taking place in this case.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the time to send a signal to the various forces in El Salvador that human rights is slipping as a priority of American policy. The evidence that I have cited speaks for itself. Under the Reagan administration, the United States has poured hundreds of millions of dollars of military aid into El Salvador. At the same time, the spiral of violence has resulted in a level of death and destruction which should cause all of us great pause. This legislation is an important vehicle for maintaining the pressure on the Government of El Salvador to put its house in order and to stop the violence against the civilian population. By adopting this measure, we are sending a clear signal to the leaders of El Salvador that the intolerable level of violence cannot go on, that the United States will not continue its endless flow of military aid to El Salvador without some improvement in the human rights conditions. I urge my colleagues to adopt this legislation.●

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4656, the El Salvador certification. This bill is identical to a bill the House and the Senate both already passed by voice vote, but which President Reagan vetoed when Congress was in recess. We must not allow President Reagan's morally obtuse policy to prevail.

The bill before us extends the certification language—in effect since December 1981—which conditions military aid to the Government of El Salvador. Under the bill, the President must certify every 6 months that the Salvadoran Government is implementing a land reform program, is committed to free elections, is improving its protection of basic human rights, and is attempting to bring to justice those responsible for the murders of American citizens in El Salvador.

I think that few would quibble with the fact that there will be no improvement in the human rights in El Salvador unless U.S. aid is made contingent upon meeting the conditions set forth in the bill. Even State Department officials have testified repeatedly before congressional committees that the conditions imposed by Congress on Salvadoran aid are the only leverage they had in pressuring the Government of El Salvador to curb the human rights violations being committed by its own security forces. Likewise, President Reagan's veto of the previous certification bill sent a clear signal to the Salvadoran Armed Forces that guaranteeing an uninterrupted, increasing flow of military aid for the war effort is his overriding concern.

President Reagan should heed the recommendations of his own National Bipartisan Commission on Central America. The so-called Kissinger Commission strongly endorsed the certification procedure and continued conditions on aid to El Salvador. In the words of the Commission report:

> Military aid should, through legislation requiring periodic reports, be made contingent upon demonstrated progress toward free elections; freedom of association; the establishment of the rule of law and an effective judicial system; and the termination of the activities of the so-called death squads, as well as vigorous action against those guilty of crimes and the prosecution to the extent possible of past offenders. These conditions should be seriously enforced.

Not surprisingly, Kissinger filed a dissent from that report. Yet, since President Reagan came to office, more than 30,000 Salvadoran civilians have been murdered by rightwing death squads. The so-called death squads are illustrative of a society where the powerful oppress the weak with impunity.

Moreover, close examination of the killings in El Salvador over the past 6 months point not to the so-called death squads, but to the regular units and command structure of the Salvadoran Armed Forces, and to the Army and National police in particular. According to the Catholic Archdiocese Office for Legal Protection in El Salvador, at least 59 percent of the reported killings of civilians in this period can be attributed to the Army. Under these circumstances, continued military aid with no strings attached is a recipe for an ultimate human rights disaster.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join with me in voting for this bill. We must remember that if the "carrot" of military aid appears more a foregone conclusion that a "reward," then the human rights conditions will never improve.●

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4656, which seeks to link U.S. foreign aid to El Salvador with adherence to the ideals of the American people and the shared aspirations of men and women throughout the world.

With this resolution, we ask nothing unreasonable or contrary to El Salvadoran national interest. We merely ask that in return for the increasing level of economic, humanitarian, and military aid we are providing, that they make steady progress toward establishing human rights, economic justice, and political freedom. We ask this not only because we think it right, but because achieving these goals will lead to regional peace, economic development, and political stability, all of which are consistent with our own national interest.

If those in control of El Salvador are forced to choose between blocking U.S.-sponsored improvements in human rights and economic justice on the one hand and trying to defeat the guerrillas without our help on the other hand, I believe they will give in to our pleasure for reforms because they know they cannot do it alone.

The extremists on both sides know, as we Americans do, that the common man of El Salvador is legitimately and deeply dissatisfied with the way he has been treated by his government for the 50 years prior to the U.S.-supported removal of the ruling military junta in 1979. The guerrillas play on this distrust to legitimize their own selfish and violent striving for power. And though the rightists long for the days when their power was absolute and guaranteed by their control of the army, I believe they know deep in their hearts that they are sowing the seeds of their own destruction by working to stifle the people's aspirations for freedom, justice, democracy, and upward economic mobility.

Therefore, I believe they will reluctantly cooperate as, apparently, they have cooperated with Vice President BUSH's unpublished demands for reining in the death squads and renegade soldiers. Those who control El Salvador can be moved toward the respect for universal human rights which, in the long run, is the only alternative to violent and total revolution.

I do not mean to overstate my confidence that we can guarantee improvements for the people of El Salvador. If we establish an unreasonable timetable for reform and thereby trigger a popular backlash against American influence there, we will have brought about the violent revolution which I trust all of us in Congress want to prevent. Such impatience would amount to a premature and foolish abandonment abroad of the ideals which we Americans treasure in our country.

The best way to avoid this is to maintain our historical perspective.

History teaches us that a society taking its first faltering steps toward the establishment of a working democracy is terribly vulnerable—no matter how well-intentioned—to foreign-backed and violent subversion by political extremists. Democracy is a delicate invention which some contend is merely an aberration in the long history of civilization. While I do not share this view, I urge my colleagues to recall how frail our own grasp of democracy and human rights was during the founding days of our Nation.

We Americans were blessed, in our struggle for democracy, by favorable geographic circumstances which protected us from excessive foreign intrigue. Foreign-sponsored terrorism of the kind experienced in modern El Salvador could easily have undermined the democratic ideals which were held by our own Founding Fathers, men of extreme courage and character. And it is equally important to remember the many serious setbacks our struggle for democracy suffered in the early years, such as the establishment of a blanket Sedition Act, several armed rebellions, the preservation of slavery and, 80 years later, a bloody civil war which pitted brother against brother.

Obviously, El Salvador today is a very different place from America more than 200 years ago. It is not sheltered from its enemies by distance, and many Salvadoran leaders have either been killed by extremist death-squads or driven out of their country by persuasive violence and terrorism.

Progress has been made in the 5 years since the United States involved itself in the struggle to establish democracy in El Salvador. And I believe that the progress has been significant. Free elections have been held over credible threats of violent intimidation; a land reform program has been initiated; and although there have been setbacks in our efforts to encourage respect for human rights, I believe slow progress has been made since the civilian government was established in 1979.

The point is that we must be careful not to abandon the good with the bad, that we acknowledge the progress along with the problems, and that we give democracy in El Salvador a chance to flourish. This is not a problem that will be solved this year or next, or perhaps not completely in the foreseeable future. Nor is this a problem that lends itself to solutions that are exclusively military, economic, or humanitarian. The interests of the people of El Salvador will best be served by blending these approaches, and pursuing them with resolve and consistency over the long run.

Success depends on the continuous support of both the American and Salvadoran people for establishing functional democracy in El Salvador. We cannot maintain the support of the American people over the long run if we find ourselves propping up a dictatorship not committed to democratic government. The American people deserve more tangible returns on their money than that. And the Salvadoran people deserve more in return for their faith in democracy. I urge my colleagues by supporting H.R. 4656, to justify the trust given us by both these peoples.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BARNES) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4656.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

"(c) At the beginning of each odd-numbered Congress, the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall designate one of the House Members as Cochairman of the Commission. At the beginning of each even-numbered Congress, the President of the Senate, on the recommendation of the majority leader, shall designate one of the Senate Members as Cochairman of the Commission.

"(d) A member of the Commission who is the chairman of a standing committee of either House of the Congress shall not be eligible to serve as Chairman or Cochairman of the Commission.".

(b) Section 7(a) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 3007(a)) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. (a) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Commission for each fiscal year such sums as may be necessary to enable it to carry out its duties and functions. Such appropriations shall be disbursed on vouchers approved (1) jointly by the Chairman and the Cochairman, (2) by a majority of the members of the personnel and administration committee, or (3) by a majority of the members of the Commission.".

(c) Section 7 of such Act (22 U.S.C. 3007) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) Foreign travel for official purposes by Commission members and staff may be authorized either the Chairman or the Cochairman.".

(d) Section 8 of such Act (22 U.S.C. 3008) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. All decisions pertaining to the hiring and firing and fixing of pay of Commission staff personnel shall be by a majority vote of the personnel and administration committee, except that (1) the Chairman shall be entitled to appoint and fix the pay of the staff director and Cochairman shall be entitled to appoint and fix the pay of his senior staff person, and (2) the Chairman and Cochairman each shall have the authority to appoint, with the approval of the personnel and administration committee, at least four professional staff members who shall be responsible to the Chairman or the Cochairman, as the case may be, who appointed them. The personnel and administration committee may appoint and fix the pay of such other staff personnel as it deems desirable. All staff appointments shall be made without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and general schedule pay rates.".

(e) Such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 9. (a) For purposes of pay and other employment benefits, rights, and privileges and for all other purposes, any employee of the Commission shall be considered to be a congressional employee as defined in section 2107 of title 5, United States Code.

"(b) For purposes of section 3304(c)(1) of title 5, United States Code, staff personnel of the Commission shall be considered as if they are in positions in which they are paid by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

"(c) The provisions of this section shall be effective as of June 3, 1976.".

(f) The amendments made by this Act shall take effect at the beginning of the first Congress which begins after the date of enactment of this Act, except that the amendment made by subsection (e) shall be effective as of June 3, 1976.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA).

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4504, a bill which amends the legislation creating the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe. This legislation provides that the Commission chairmanship will be rotated between the House and Senate. In previous years, a Member of the Senate has served the Commission as Cochairman, and the Speaker of the House has appointed one of the six Commissioners from the House to serve as Chairman.

The bill before the Members contains provisions which would:

Amend the 1976 act establishing the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe to provide that the chairmanship will rotate between the House and the Senate beginning in the 99th Congress.

Provide for a formal Cochairman of the Commission.

Provide that the Chairman and Cochairman have the authority to appoint an equal number of professional staff members.

Prohibit any Member of the Commission who chairs a standing committee of either the House or Senate from chairing the Commission.

Clarifies the eligibility of the Commission staff to receive the same benefits accorded to congressional employees.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

The committee agreed to two amendments:

To change the effective date to the 99th Congress (January 1985) instead of the 100th Congress.

To clarify existing practice that Commission employees be considered congressional employees for purposes of pay and benefits.

The principal purpose of this legislation is to respond to the Senate's concerns that a more equitable arrangement concerning the chairmanship of the Helsinki Commission be found. As you know, Mr. Speaker, under existing law, you appoint one of the six Commissioners from the House to serve as Chairman, an honor Chairman DANTE FASCELL has had since the Commission's establishment in 1976. H.R. 4504 amends the 1976 law to provide that the Commission chairmanship rotate, at the beginning of every new Congress, between the House and Senate.

This bill also establishes by law the position of Cochairman, which is now only an informal arrangement. Both the Chairman and Cochairman would have the authority to appoint an equal number of professional staff members, to approve foreign travel and to disburse appropriated funds. Under this legislation, both bodies of the Congress would be formally represented in the Commission leadership.

H.R. 4504 also provides that no member of the Commission who chairs a standing committee of either the House or Senate would be eligible to chair the Commission. This provision, which is in complete accordance with existing House and Senate rules, insures that the vital concerns of the Commission will be addressed by a Chairman who is able to devote adequate time to them.

The other provisions in H.R. 4504 are technical amendments which clarify the eligibility of the Commission staff to receive the same benefits accorded to congressional employees.

In my opinion, this is a fair and equitable solution to the disputes that have disrupted the Commission's work in the last few months. The legislation provides for an orderly transition every 2 years while, at the same time, it insures that the nonpartisan professionalism and expertise of the staff and the focus of the Commission's work will be maintained. This legislation insures the kind of professional continuity that the rules of the various joint committees of the Congress already provide. This bill provides for continuity in the direction of the Commission from Congress to Congress and, hopefully, will enhance the Senate's participation in and visibility on the Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I know you agree that the concerns of the Helsinki Commission are too vital to be hampered by differences among its members. It is my fervent wish that the passage of my bill will resolve these problems and, at the same time, insure the continuation of the Commission's important work.

Thank you.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4504, legislation providing for the rotation of the chairmanship of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe between the Senate and the House.

During hearings yesterday before the Subcommittee on International Operations, of which I am the ranking minority member, many groups dedicated to monitoring the implementation of the Helsinki accords testified in support of this measure. As amended by the subcommittee, the legislation provides that the Senate instead of the House shall select a Chairman to serve in odd-numbered Congresses. The House will select a Chairman in even-numbered Congresses. Thus, a Member of the Senate will chair the Commission starting in January 1985, during the 1st session of the 99th Congress.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 4504. It is imperative that we have a coordinated effort of both the House and Senate to monitor and address effectively the critical issue of promoting human rights. I believe the measure before us will help us to achieve that important objective.

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support H.R. 4504. This bill amends the legislation creating the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The legislation specifies that the Commission chairmanship be rotated between the House and Senate. Under the existing arrangement, a Member of the Senate serves the Commission as Cochairman. The Speaker of the House currently appoints one of the six Commissioners from the House to serve as Chairman.

The bill we are considering today also provides for a formal Cochairman of the Commission. It provides that the Chairman and Cochairman have the authority to appoint an equal number of professional staff members. It gives Commission staff employees the same benefits accorded to congressional employees.

The legislation before us is a step in the right direction. It merits our support. I call on my colleagues to join me in voting for this legislation.●

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I lend my support to this legislation which I believe will enhance the work of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, often referred to as the Helsinki Commission.

The Commission, in monitoring and encouraging compliance with the Helsinki Final Act, has contributed greatly to an increased, worldwide understanding of the importance of human rights. The Commission has performed its function in a manner that complements other public and private human rights organizations, and has a highly professional staff which is well qualified to represent American interests.

I believe that the Commission has been instrumental in compelling the Soviet Government to realize the importance the Western World places on human rights. In forcing this recognition, the Commission has engineered considerable gains in the area of military security. The Commission's role has proven to be invaluable, especially during the current absence of European arms-control negotiations.

As cochairman of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus, I have become familiar with the work of the Commission and the excellent leadership provided by the gentleman from Florida, Mr. FASCELL. He has proven that our concern for human rights overrules conflict and endures struggle. Mr. FASCELL has shown us that human rights are an integral component of any foreign policy, and the Helsinki Commission's success has proven that America is committed to human dignity.

I therefore encourage my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation, and to recognize the admirable performance of the Commission and Mr. FASCELL.●

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4504, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

EXPRESSING SENSE OF CONGRESS REGARDING SELF-DETERMINATION OF BALTIC STATES

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 80) expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should take all steps necessary to bring the question of self-determination of the Baltic States before the United Nations, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. CON. RES. 80

Whereas the United States, since its inception, has been committed to the principle of self-determination;

Whereas the United States has adhered to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and other relevant instruments relating to human rights;

Whereas the United States has supported the Declaration of Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in Resolution 1514 (XV) of December 14, 1960, and has taken note of the resolution on the question of the Baltic States, adopted by the European Parliament in its session on January 13, 1983, in Strassbourg, France;

Whereas the three Baltic republics, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, did not become member republics of the Soviet Union voluntarily, but rather were occupied militarily and subsequently incorporated by force into the Soviet Union and have since been governed by governments approved by, and subservient to, the Government of the Soviet Union; and

Whereas the United States has consistently refused to recognize the unlawful Soviet occupation of the Baltic States and has continued to maintain diplomatic relations with representatives of the independent republics of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the United States, as a member of the United Nations, should fulfill its obligations, on the basis of the appropriate international instruments, to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania;

(2) the President, acting through the Secretary of State and the Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations, should take all necessary steps to bring the question of self-determination of the Baltic States before all appropriate forums of the United Nations, especially before the next session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission as a priority topic under agenda item 9 entitled "The Rights of Peoples to Self-Determination and its Application to Peoples Under Colonial or Alien Domination" and to discuss specifically in those forums—

(A)(i) the continued reports of widespread violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, including the freedom of expression, the freedom to worship according to the dictates of one's own conscience, the freedom to celebrate one's cultural heritage, and the freedom to choose one's place of residence; and

(ii) the persecution of persons seeking to exercise such rights;

(B) the United States most profound concern that the people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania be granted the right to self-determination, to choose their own form of government, their own economic, political, and social system without any outside intervention, subversion, coercion, or constraint of any kind; and

(C) a political resolution of the situation in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania on the basis of—

(i) the withdrawal of Soviet troops from these states,

(ii) respect for the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, and

(iii) strict observance of the principle of nonintervention by one sovereign state in the internal and external affairs of another sovereign state.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA).

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to present these remarks on behalf of my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. YATRON), who could not be here at this time and who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations. I would like to read for the RECORD Chairman YATRON's statement.

Mr. Speaker, Senate Concurrent Resolution 80 addresses the issue of self-determination of the Baltic States. This measure expresses the sense of Congress that the United States should promote respect for human rights and freedom in Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. It further provides that the President should raise the issue of Baltic self-determination in all appropriate forums, including the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

Today, Baltic citizens are struggling within the Soviet Union for their right to freedom, justice, and self-determination. Their language, culture, and traditions have been threatened, and their leaders persecuted in an attempt to break their spirit and enforce their subjugation. The continued denial of personal freedoms and human rights has not forced them to abandon their fight, but rather has reinforced their courage and quest for freedom.

The Lithuanians, Latvians, and Estonians lost their struggle against military domination by the Soviet Union, but they have been fighting ever since to regain their independence and keep their identity strong. These noble people deserve our support and recognition for their efforts to preserve their traditions in the face of sustained repressive tactics by an oppressive regime. Through this legislation, we can applaud the courageous strivings of the Baltic States, denounce the betrayal of our most cherished principles, and demonstrate to the world that we will never tolerate illegal Soviet domination and abuse of human rights.

The U.S. Congress must act now to show once again our support for the Baltic Republics. The question of these republics will be raised at the annual meeting of the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva which began yesterday. By utilizing this international instrument, and others like it, we can help the eyes of the world focus on the plight of the citizens of the Baltic States.

I urge my colleagues to support Senate Concurrent Resolution 80.

□ 1340

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 80, a resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should take all steps necessary to bring the question of self-determination for the Baltic States before the United Nations, and for other purposes.

As the gentleman from Florida has explained, the resolution calls upon the President and his representatives to take steps to bring the question of self-determination for the Baltic States before all appropriate forums of the United Nations, particularly the 40th session of the UN Human Rights Commission which just convened in Geneva, Switzerland on February 6. The chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. FASCELL, and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, Mr. YATRON, are to be commended for expediting House consideration of this legislation. I might add that I know of no objection to Senate Concurrent Resolution 80 from the administration and would remind my colleagues that the other body passed this same resolution back in November without a single dissenting vote.

As my colleagues know, the United States has never recognized the forcible incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into the Soviet Union. Human rights conditions in the Baltic States today mirror problems existent throughout the Soviet Union. Thus, the issue of human rights for the Baltic States extends beyond the central question of self-determination. All peoples within the Soviet orbit are denied the right to worship freely, to express their political views, to preserve their ethnic and national identities and to exercise many other internationally recognized human rights. The United States ought not to be shy about raising these issues in international forums. In that light, I urge my colleagues to give their unanimous support to this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN).

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 80, especially in this time of increased Soviet expansionist activity. Let us not forget the strength and will of the Baltic people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania in their pursuit of self-determination. The people of the Baltic States are our natural allies. The states of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania incorporated by the domination of the Soviet Union must never be recognized. The rich culture, music, and language of the Baltic people is being gradually snuffed out of existence. We have witnessed the continual Soviet abuse of human rights not only in the Baltic States but across the globe as well as in the Soviet Union itself.

Many Soviet Jews are still denied exit visas for freedom. The plight of Soviet Jewry is most dramatically depicted by Anatoly Shcharansky, who remains imprisoned only because he desires the freedom to practice his religion. My colleagues on the Post Office and Civil Service Committee have helped me document evidence of increased Soviet mail interruption by the KGB. The Soviets continually violate the Helsinki accords, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and their own Constitution. Let us not forget Soviet actions in Poland, Afghanistan, Syria, and Grenada. And let us not forget the despicable Soviet downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 80 is additional evidence of American leadership in the pursuit of freedom and liberty for all people and nations. The brave people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania may not be physically capable of standing up to Soviet totalitarian and military domination, but spiritually they still strive for the freedom that has been denied since World War II. The United States has the responsibility to continue to lead the free world in all areas. I strongly urge the President of the United States to bring the question of self-determination of the Baltic States before the United Nations, with a renewed sense of spirit and determination for all those who aspire to be free. The United States must not, and will not, bow to blatant, inhumane Soviet aggression and domination. Senate Concurrent Resolution 80 comes before us today, and especially mindful of our global situation, I urge its swift passage by my colleagues.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP), the distinguished leader of the Republican conference.

Mr. KEMP. I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa, for yielding and congratulate him for his remarks, and also the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN), who have both been longtime champions of the cause of human rights and the Helsinki Commission and, of course, rasing the plight of the Baltic States before international public opinion.

The gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA) is also a leader in this effort and I bow to him for his bipartisan efforts.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to add my own comments about this cause. My wife and I visited the Soviet Union this summer and we came away with a sense of despondency with regard to the treatment of any minority group in the Soviet Union and their human rights.

The gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH) alluded to the fact that the right to worship, the right to just enjoy elementary freedoms, is being snuffed out more thoroughly and more emphatically than in a long time. I know if it is happening in the Soviet Union it is also happening in Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, and of course we can go on and mention Poland and Romania and Bulgaria and Hungary and Czechoslovakia, et cetera, et cetera.

I would have hoped on the previous resolution, which I supported, that we would have brought up the fact that the Helsinki Monitoring Commission must reelevate this issue because at this very moment men and women are being led off to the Gulag Archipelago for no other reason than being Christian, no other reason than being Jews and wanting to emigrate to Israel, no other reason than to raise their voices against the totalitarian machinery of the Soviet Union.

I want to remind everyone that within 2 weeks of passing the Helsinki accords and the signature of the United States of America, the Soviet Union denied Andrei Sakharov the right to go to Oslo for the Nobel Peace Prize. Shcharansky is still in prison, and there are Jews and Christians, as I mentioned before, imprisoned in the Soviet Union for their beliefs. There is Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, there is Soviet oppression in Poland, and of course what they have done to the once proud countries of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia remains a scandal in the history of aggressive and inexcusable acts.

I am not trying to escalate rhetoric, but the world needs to know that there is a massive denial of elementary, rudimentary, basic human rights throughout the Soviet empire, and it seems to me that this resolution is a healthy and positive and a candid way of broadcasting to the world the difference between the Democratic West and the totalitarian machinery of the Soviet Union.

So I just want to compliment the gentleman from Iowa, the gentleman from Florida, thank them, agree with this proposal totally, and urge its unanimous support in the Halls of the U.S. House of Representatives. To do any less would be to default on those Jeffersonian principles upon which the American Revolution was fought.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I have one request on a point of inquiry. I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR.).

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly strongly support this resolution. I think it is a splendid resolution. I agree with what the gentleman from New York just said.

I would like to ask one question, and that is this: I have so little use for what happened in the United Nations and what they do and what they do not do. I notice here that this resolution calls on the U.S. Government to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in these Baltic States by bringing the question of their self-determination before the U.N. Human Rights Commission and other appropriate U.N. forums.

My question is: If we pass this resolution, do we have any belief or any understanding that what we are doing here will be taken up before the appropriate areas in the United Nations, or will they ignore it like they do so many other things we do here?

Mr. MICA. If I may respond to the gentleman, as the new chairman of the subcommittee that will deal with a number of these issues, I want him to know that I have a great deal of concern about whether or not the United Nations responds to any of the initiatives taken by this country or by this Congress.

It is a sense of Congress resolution. It is only that. It does not have the effect of law on the United Nations, and as the gentleman rightly questions, we do not have an assurance, but we are going to do everything we can to continue to raise these issues, bring them to the attention of the United Nations. Let me say that they are creating their own track record of support or nonsupport for these issues, and this Congress will be looking at that track record.

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. I commend the gentleman from Florida for bringing this matter before the House.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. RITTER).

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to also thank the chairman of the subcommittee, Congressman YATRON, for his actions in this matter, and I urge my colleagues to reaffirm what the Senate has already achieved with passage of this resolution.

As cochairman of the ad hoc Congressional Commitee on Baltic States and Ukraine, along with cochairman, BRIAN DONNELLY, I sponsored this resolution calling on the President to direct the U.S. delegation to the United Nations to discuss the issue of self-determination for the Baltic States before all appropriate U.N. forums. I am pleased to see this legislation has made its way through the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and is before us today on the floor.

This resolution, specifically includes this session of the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva, which was convened yesterday. I think it is a very timely and important message that we send.

At this time I would only like to call attention to the peoples of the Baltic States who have their own, unique culture; their own, unique language; their own, unique traditions. It is only fitting therefore, that we in Congress recognize these truly independent nations of that part of the world is subsumed by the Soviet empire.

The responsibility lies with us, lies with Baltic Americans from all parts of the country, to keep that flame of self-determination alive so that one day it is conceivable that these people will be free.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I just would like to also bring to the attention of the House that the gentleman who just spoke, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. RITTER), and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DONNELLY), were the primary sponsors of this legislation.

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 80, legislation relating to the question of self-determination of the Baltic States. Today, the Lithuanians, Latvians, and Estonians battle an oppressive regime for their political, cultural, and religious freedoms. Their struggle for survival, for the right to express an ethnic identity, has not forced the citizens of the Baltic States to abandon their efforts, but has instead increased their fervor for freedom.

Lithuanians, Estonians, and Latvians have endured relentless Soviet occupation and repression yet they have maintained their dreams of national liberty. I believe their unyielding struggle must never be forgotten by those of us who enjoy freedom. The United States has always promoted respect for human rights and freedom for the Baltic States. Through this legislation, we have an opportunity to stand together with these patriots and support them in their attempts to gain self-determination.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, I believe it is important to act now to underscore our strong interest in the Baltic republics, which will be discussed at the annual meeting of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva which began February 6. By using the appropriate international instruments, our country can bring to worldwide attention, the unlawful Soviet occupation of the Baltic republics, the continued human rights violations suffered by the Baltic citizens, and the struggle for the right to self-determination that ensues in these three republics.

By supporting the measure before us today, the U.S. Congress is expressing its concern to all those nations seeking control of their destiny, free from foreign domination. We are sending a message that we, as Americans, seek universal compliance of human rights provisions as embodied in the Helsinki doctrine in order that all nationalities may enjoy basic human rights.●

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, much has been written and said about the plight of the Baltic States in the past 40 years.

There is nothing new I can offer to the superabundant documentation, unquestioned by fairminded and knowledgeable scholars and experts, that the people of the Baltic States have been systematically and consistently deprived of basic human rights by the Soviet Union.

There is nothing I can add to such undisputed evidence. In the words of Senate Concurrent Resolution 80:

> The United States has consistently refused to recognize the unlawful Soviet occupation of the Baltic States and has continued to maintain diplomatic relations with representatives of the independent republics of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania * * *.

But I want to mention one curious fact: Although the people of these states have been deprived of their basic human rights for over 40 years, only rarely is this fact mentioned on the floor of the House. I never can recall it being mentioned during debates over human rights policies.

Why? Why is there such a silence about the human rights violations of the Baltic States? Is it because these suffering people are not fashionable enough to have their misery noted by otherwise eloquent defenders of human rights? Is it because in certain circles it is considered old fashioned to point out that the Soviet Union is the most flagrant violator of human rights in the world today?

Ask the people of the Baltic States if they agree with President Reagan's description of the Soviet Union as "an evil empire."

Self-determination for the Baltic States? I would like to see the United Nations debate that issue. It would clear the air as to exactly what superpower is exercising despotic control over human beings whose only crime is that once, years ago, they decided to be free.●

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the free nations of the world have not forgotten the 1940 Soviet invasion of the Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. It is our determination not to allow the tragic 44 years history of the captive nations under Soviet rule to be forgotten, and not to let the hope die that one day the Baltic States may regain their freedom. In light of this I fully support Senate Concurrent Resolution 80 to urge the President to bring the question of self-determination of the Baltic States before the United Nations and international human rights forums.

It is crucial that we prevent the Soviets from achieving their cruel objective of erasing the memory of the sovereignty of the Baltic States which have fallen victim to Soviet imperialism. The premeditated nature of the 1940 invasion characterizes Soviet disregard for human rights and national self-determination.

We will continue our concern over the treatment of the Baltic peoples. We have not forgotten that hundreds of thousands of people in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania were uprooted from their native lands and driven savagely to Siberian labor camps where many thousands were to perish of starvation, disease, and exposure. We have not forgotten the 44 years of political repression, religious persecution, and cultural genocide which has been inflicted by Soviet rulers. Nor have we forgotten the repeated violations of the right to self-determination expressed both in the Helsinki accords and the Charter of the United Nations as it would apply to the Baltic States.

The living memory of the nature of Soviet rule must serve to remind us of the importance of raising our voices in loud and repeated protest against new episodes in the history of Soviet ruthlessness against those who would fight for freedom. Such ruthlessness is exemplified by the recent imposition by proxy of martial law upon the people of Poland, the blitzkrieg-like invasion of Afghanistan, and the continued imprisonment of Soviet citizens who dare to express a desire to emigrate.

So long as we in the free nations of the world remember these lessons, the hope for freedom for those now subjected to Soviet domination is strong. We now see excessive Soviet military spending straining their economy to the extent that they cannot feed their own people. We see numerous national and ethnic liberation movements within the Soviet Union posing a serious threat to the dominance of the Russian minority. We also see a growing number of Soviets dissatisfied with a government which exists not for their sake, but for its own sake. This evidence of an empire crumbling from within leads me to believe that it is not unrealistic to imagine the day when the Baltic States may regain their freedom and independence.

Until that day, it is up to the United States, where we enjoy an unmatched degree of individual freedom and cultural diversity, to reaffirm our commitment to the liberation of the Baltic States. I will continue to work with my colleagues here in the Congress to support this resolution and to further, in whatever way I can, the cause of freedom for the people of the Baltic States.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased that the House is considering Senate Concurrent Resolution 80 today. I commend Chairman FASCELL and Subcommittee Chairman YATRON for bringing this deserving resolution to the full House so expeditiously.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RITTER, and I introduced identical legislation, House Concurrent Resolution 192, in October of last year urging the President to take all steps necessary to bring the question of self-determination of the Baltic States before the United Nations.

This resolution once again confirms longstanding policy of the United States in regard to the Baltic States. Our Nation has consistently refused to recognize the unlawful Soviet occupation of the Baltic States and has continued to maintain diplomatic relations with representatives of the independent Republics of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. The resolution calls for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from the Baltic States, and an affirmation of the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of these nations.

It will interest my colleagues to know that the European Parliament adopted a similar resolution calling for self-determination of the Baltic States on January 13, 1983.

Passage of this resolution today by the House presents the Soviets with another reminder that this Congress and this Nation will continue to keep the legitimate right of the Baltic States to self-determination an active issue before the international community. I urge my colleagues to support this most timely legislation.●

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 80, which calls upon the U.S. Government to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in the Baltic States by bringing the question of self-determination before the U.S. Human Rights Commission.

The people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania have engaged for many years in a constant struggle to retain their national identities, despite harsh Soviet repression. It is appropriate that the United States, with its reverence for freedom and self-determination, should make every effort to bring these concerns before the appropriate United Nations forums.

The people of the Baltic States have spent over 40 years under the control of the Soviet Union. Their distinct linguistic, ethnic, and religious identities have been challenged. Their citizens have been subject to prosecution for speaking out for political and religious freedom. And yet, these courageous people have persisted in resisting all Soviet efforts to suppress their national identities.

The United States has never formally recognized the Soviet occupation of the Baltic States, since their annexation during World War II. Baltic Americans have repeatedly drawn our attention to their compatriots under Soviet rule and have not allowed us to ignore the plight of these nations. The ongoing stories of political repression, occurring in these republics, make this a timely opportunity to renew our commitment to the people of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.●

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA) that the House suspend the rules and concur in the Senate concurrent resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 80.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate concurrent resolution just concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

RAILROAD ACCOUNTING PRINCIPLES BOARD AUTHORIZATION

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4439) extending the authorization for the Railroad Accounting Principles Board, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 4439

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 11161 of title 49, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (c)(2), by inserting ", except that no such individual may be paid at a rate which exceeds the rate prescribed for level V of the Executive Schedule" before the period; and

(2) in subsection (f), by striking out "effective date of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980" and inserting in lieu thereof "members of the Board are appointed under this section".

(b) Section 11162(a) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by striking out "effective date of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980" and inserting in lieu thereof "members of the Board are appointed under section 11161 of this title".

(c) Section 11167 of title 49, United States Code, is amended by striking out "effective date of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980" and inserting in lieu thereof "members of the Board are appointed under section 11161 of this title".

(d) Section 11168 of title 49, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "1981" and inserting in lieu thereof "1984";

(2) by striking out "1982" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985"; and

(3) by striking out "1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "1986".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FLORIO) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York (Mr. LENT) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FLORIO).

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill, which I urge the House to support. This bill extends the authorization of the Railroad Accounting Principles Board for 3 years, at $1 million a year.

The Railroad Accounting Principles Board was originally established in the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 and was designed to develop principles to help determine economically accurate railroad costs. Unfortunately, the Board was never funded, and its authorization expired September 30.

Mr. Speaker, my subcommittee has recently had three oversight hearings on the Staggers Rail Act. Shippers have a variety of concerns about how the act has been implemented, but there was one common theme throughout: Concern about how railroad costs are determined. Many shipper groups that testified urged the reauthorization of the Board. The Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission indicated his support for reauthorization at our July hearing.

In recognition of this concern, the Energy and Commerce Committee included a reauthorization for the Board in H.R. 3648, the Amtrak Improvement Act of 1983. To expedite the reauthorization of the Board, I introduced a clean bill on November 17 that would just reauthorize the Board. This clean bill has been cosponsored by the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. LENT), West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL), Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN), Kentucky (Mr. ROGERS), and New Mexico (Mr. RICHARDSON).

The bill that I introduced is identical to the provision in H.R. 3648, with one minor exception. The clean bill includes a limitation on the salary of the staff of the Board, at executive level V. Existing law has no such cap, so that this provision ensures a fiscally responsible Board.

Mr. Speaker, there is some urgency to this bill. The supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984, H.R. 3959, Public Law 98-181, which the House passed in November, includes $50,000 for startup expenses of the Board, but contingent upon the enactment of an authorization. Thus, passage of this legislation is essential if the work of the Board is to begin.

I urge support of this bill.

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4439.

This bill quite simply extends the authorization of the Railroad Accounting Principles Board for 3 years. This Board was originally authorized under section 302 of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 but was never actually established due to a lack of appropriations.

Under the terms of section 302 of the Staggers Act, the Railroad Accounting Principles Board was to exist for 3 years. It was designed as an independent entity to be composed of six members who are experts in the field of accounting, rate regulation, economics, the rail industry and shipping, and chaired by the Comptroller General.

The Staggers Act gives the Board an agenda of developing principles to govern the determination of railroad costs in transporting goods. These accounting principles will be used by the Interstate Commerce Commission in certain regulatory proceedings. For example, principles which help determine the cost of rail movements are needed in Commission proceedings concerned with the "reasonableness" of a particular rail rate. Whether a particular rate is excessive depends on several technical determinations regarding not only the cost of the movement, but also the "revenue adequacy" or profitability of the rail carrier.

In developing these cost accounting principles, the Board must take into account a series of considerations specified in section 302 of the Staggers Act, which include due consideration of the railroads' need for confidentiality of its costs and avoidance of overly burdensome information reporting.

Once these principles are developed, the Commission must promulgate rules implementing and enforcing them. Section 302 of the Staggers Act requires each rail carrier to get its cost accounting system certified by the ICC to insure it is consistent with the Commission's rules.

Accordingly, the Board will act as an objective body to develop accurate cost accounting principles which will apply to the entire railroad industry in an effort to insure consistency in railroad accounting practices.

Accurate and objective cost data is essential to the successful implementation of the Staggers Rail Act and deregulation of the rail industry in general.

The creation of the Board is strongly supported by the National Coal Association, the Fertilizer Institute, and other members of the shipping community who use rail to transport their goods.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 4439.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. ROGERS).

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support for H.R. 4439. I would like to commend the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism, Mr. FLORIO, for his sponsorship of this legislation, and the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee for expediting the debate on this bill.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today offers a fair and badly needed response to the aura of controversy surrounding recent Interstate Commerce Commission decisions.

It reauthorizes the Railroad Accounting Principles Board—an independent board which was originally authorized in the Staggers Act. Its purpose is to develop sound accounting principles to be used by the ICC in evaluating the railroads' financial condition.

This Board was an essential part of the delicate balance in the Staggers Act. The act gave the railroads much greater flexibility in setting their rates if they met certain financial requirements. It gave the ICC the job of determining whether or not they met these requirements. But it gave the Accounting Board the job of overseeing the all important accounting methods to be used in making these decisions.

Unfortunately, until this year funds were never appropriated for the Board. This year, it received its appropriation, subject to this authorization measure being passed.

And let me assure you, never has this legislation been more badly needed than it is today.

In case after case, the ICC has cavalierly ignored congressional mandates to maintain adequate protection for captive shippers. In case after case, the ICC has implemented procedures and accounting methods which, at least on paper, make the railroads' revenue adequacy appear poorer, make their expenses appear higher, and make their variable costs appear higher still. All this to give the railroads greatly increased margins of rate flexibility, immune from ICC control.

In the Staggers Act, the railroads wanted a whole loaf—we gave them three-fourths of the loaf of deregulation. But the ICC did not stop there. They gave them the rest of the loaf, then the bakery, then the supermarkets, delivery trucks, farms, and anything else they could find to throw in on the bargain.

I would like to present just a few examples of these ICC decisions.

Perhaps the most important decision was the definition of revenue adequacy. A finding of revenue adequacy or inadequacy is the key determinant of how much oversight the ICC maintains in rate-setting.

Back when the Staggers Act was passed, the ICC was using an accounting method that required the examination of a broad range of variables in making this determination.

But since then, the ICC has substantially redefined this term. Now they look at only one measure of the railroads' financial condition—their return on investment. And this changed method has had an extremely dramatic effect.

Under this new method, the ICC has found every single class one railroad in the entire country to be revenue inadequate. And this is despite the fact that many of our railroads are showing hefty profits.

And it goes on and on. There is the question of stipulating which expenses and revenues should be considered in the return on investment (ROI) calculation. I was outraged to learn that if a railroad owns a fuel oil company which supplies all its diesel fuel, the cost of the fuel is listed as an expense in the ROI calculation. But on the other side of the ledger, not a penny of the revenues of the fuel oil company are considered. Such calculations reduce the ROI figure—which in turn is used to justify approval of higher rail rates.

Accounting for many Members of this body is a complex field—with lists of numbers defying comprehension. But buried deep in those neat rows of figures are sleight-of-hand stunts which have cost the American public billions of dollars—because Mr. Speaker, someone has to pay those railroad bills. In 1981, our utilities paid $5 billion to move their coal on the railroads. As a result of ICC actions, they expect these costs to double in 5 years, triple in 8 years, and to quadruple in 10 years.

And of course, it is our residential and industrial consumers who will pay for this policy.

And the results get worse and worse. These ICC decisions are having a devastating effect on America's coal exports—forcing America into the unpleasant role of "supplier of last resort." Japan has already reduced their purchases of American coal by about 12 million tons. European coal buyers meeting last December announced plans to cut back purchases of American coal by 5 to 10 million tons. They have given us one message and they have made it loud and clear.

Our transportation costs are so high and are so uncertain that to them it is not worth it to do business with American coal companies—even if they prefer doing business with us than with unstable South Africa, Poland, and Australia. And with about 70,000 coal miners unemployed, this is serious news indeed.

And, of course, this would have devastating effects on our balance of payments as well. With our own Department of Energy estimating that rail rates would increase by 90 percent by 1995, we can expect to lose another 36.6 million tons of coal sales per year by that time.

So the bottom line of those neat tallies in the ledger books is continued record profits for the railroads—at the expense of lost coal jobs, higher utility bills and worsening balance of payments for the rest of America.

The Railroad Principles Accounting Board is not a panacea. It does not rewrite the Staggers Act. It does not reimpose one iota of Federal regulation. It does not subtract one bit of the railroads' freedom to run financially viable operations.

What it does do is enforce the Staggers Act—so that if the ICC grants flexibility to a railroad designated as "revenue inadequate," we will know for a fact that it is indeed revenue inadequate. This is a needed step. This is a prudent step. This is a step that is good for American consumers and American business. I thank the committee for their support of this legislation and urge its immediate passage.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. RAHALL).

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, one of the major concerns in the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 was the development of sound and reasonable railroad accounting principles necessary to determine the accuracy of railroad costs.

It was because of the Interstate Commerce Commission's inept attempts to develop such a system, and the fact that accurate cost determinations became even more vital as a result of changes in rail regulation made by the 1980 act, that Congress sought to transfer this responsibility to a Railroad Accounting Principles Board under the auspices of the Comptroller General and composed of experts in the field of rate regulation, accounting, economics, railroads, and shipping.

Independent of the ICC, it was felt that the Board would develop a fair set of accounting principles which would govern the determination of all railroad costs for specific regulatory proceedings.

Unfortunately, an appropriation was never made for the Board and its authorization expired at the end of fiscal year 1983. However, the necessity of making available to shippers accurate and reliable data with respect to the railroads' costs for performing specific movements have never been more important than it is today.

As such, I find H.R. 4439, a bill which would extend the authorization of the Railroad Accounting Principles Board through fiscal year 1986, to be a very important piece of legislation. I strongly support this bill and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

At this point, I would like to commend the chairman of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism, JAMES FLORIO, and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, NORMAN LENT, for recognizing the need for this Board. Under the leadership of Chairman JOHN DINGELL, who has long been sensitive to the effects the Staggers Rail Act is having on shippers and carriers alike, today we are sending out a strong signal that the Congress intends for the 1980 act to be implemented in a responsible manner.

I would also be remiss if I did not mention the interest shown in the creation of this Board by the chairman of the Subcommittee on Legislative, VIC FAZIO, who was instrumental in providing an appropriation for the Board in the fiscal year 1984 supplemental. Furthermore, also to be commended are the 47 Members who are cosponsors to H.R. 2584, legislation which I have introduced which among other items, makes provision to reauthorize the Railroad Accounting Principles Board.

Mr. Speaker, the conferees on the Staggers Rail Act recognized the wisdom of the Board when they stated in the report:

> The Conferees expect that while the Board develops its principles, the Commission will continue its efforts to complete the uniform revenue and cost systems which it commenced after that passage of the 4R Act so that the Board, as part of its task, will be able to evaluate that system as it is developing its principles.

The key phrase in this statement, in my mind, is "as it is developing its principles" because the ICC is in the process of finalizing a monstrosity called the uniform rail costing system (URCS). The ICC has been bumbling over URCS for the past 3 years knowledgeable of the fact that there would be little independent oversight of the basic flaws of this new system since the Board was not in place. It should be noted that this new costing system still cannot distinguish between major heavy-hauling lines of a carrier and branch lines, or light-density lines, as far as cost of service. Both formulas are tied to using only the system-average cost of maintenance and investment, for example, for an individual carrier.

Now that the Board is well on its way to becoming a reality, it is my hope the ICC will delay its formal adoption of URCS so that the Board may evaluate it in its development stage as Congress originally intended. A deferral of the ICC's implementation of URCS will in no way create any problems in making rail cost determinations.

In this discussion, we must not lose sight of the fact that the Staggers Rail Act requires that rates for captive traffic be maintained at a reasonable level. In order to define that term, it is necessary to develop an understanding of maximum reasonable rate levels and the work of the Railroad Accounting Principles Board will be extremely important in that respect. To date, the reasonableness issue—which is the very cornerstone of railroad regulation—has escaped the ICC even though in its goal rate guidelines the Commission has indicated that the use of stand-alone costs is the method of arriving at the maximum level of rate reasonableness.

However, according to a statement of an ICC administrative law judge made in his decision in a Consumers Power Co. complaint case recently:

> The use of stand-alone costs as a constraint on the pricing of the transportation of captive traffic as in this proceeding results in an impossible burden being placed upon the complainant. The inherent difficulty and absurdity of such a requirement can be seen from the stand-alone findings shown in the appendix herein. As shown there, the Commission's present cost standards appear to give the defendant railroads the right to charge exorbitant rates on captive traffic, as long as such carriers are not revenue adequate, and are not shown to be inefficient. Using the present method of arriving at a finding as to which carriers are revenue adequate it will be difficult if not impossible for any carrier to be considered revenue adequate. It therefore does not appear presently feasible for a finding to be made that a complained of rate is unreasonably high.

This same administrative law judge further stated that the ICC, since enactment of the Staggers Rail Act, has not found a rate to be unreasonable.

Incredible as it may seem, rates as high as 235 percent of variable costs have been found to be reasonable by the Commission. It is as such not surprising that this administrative law judge stated that there is no hope for complainant shippers. And, he advised shippers that "Congress appears the sole chance for captive shippers to gain a hearing and possible relief from the claimed inadequacies of the Staggers Act."

This situation lends further credence to the need for the Railroad Accounting Principles Board which should make possible the construction of reasonable standards to be applied in the development of maximum reasonable rates.

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, to conclude debate, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. DORGAN).

□ 1410

Mr. DORGAN. I thank the Chairman.

I rise in support of H.R. 4439. It is a first step on promoting railroad accountability. I would like to associate myself with the remarks of Mr. ROGERS, who took the well moments ago to speak about this subject.

I have asked for time to go beyond this bill and suggested to this House, as I did in the 1-minute statement earlier today, that we have some extraordinarily serious problems out in the middle of this country with railroad service. We have to take some prompt action here in Congress to start addressing some of those concerns.

I pointed out this morning that we gave 23 percent of the State of North Dakota to the railroads when the railroads began operating. Think of that, 23 percent of my home State was given to railroads as land grants.

That allowed those railroads to build main lines and branch lines to serve our part of the country. We live a good long ways from either coast or from major waterways. So we rely on the railroads to ship our grain, to ship our agricultural commodities to ports. The difficulty is the railroads have decided in recent years to form holding companies, strip those land grant assets away from the railroads, and then plead poverty for the railroads.

I think that tramples on the public interest requirement that railroads continue to serve lines that operate out in the Midwestern part of this country.

There are a number of solutions to this problem, but it is going to take a lot of courage and a lot of work on the part of the U.S. Congress to put railroads back on track. I do not think it serves public purpose in this country to have the railroads play a shell game with us and strip away the oil and the timber and the coal rights that were given those railroads for the purpose of building and operating a railroad and then to plead poverty later on while they run their oil companies and run their timber companies and run their mineral companies. We must not allow the railroads to conclude that they cannot afford to provide branch line services to parts of North Dakota, Kansas, Iowa and so on. That is not in the public interest.

In fact, we ought to start fighting them. There are plenty of pieces of legislation in this House to start doing that. This is a first step. It is necessary, but there is plenty left to do.

I hope that the subcommittees and committees in the Congress will heed the words of Harry Truman in the 1930's, when over on the other side, he said, "There is train robbery going on. Jesse James is doing it for $3,000. It was on the front page of the Independence, Missouri Press. But now it is being done by lawyers and accountants in the form of holding companies." It is still train robbery, we can stop that today even in this year of 1984 and I hope my colleagues in this House will take heed.

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4439. This bill simply reauthorizes the Railroad Accounting Principles Board.

The Staggers Rail Act, passed by the Congress in 1980, created this Board to develop "principles governing the determination of economically accurate railroad costs directly and indirectly associated with particular movement of goods" by rail.

These accounting principles will govern the determination of railroad costs for regulatory proceedings at the Interstate Commerce Commission. With reliable cost information provided by the Board, the Commission will be able to successfully implement the Staggers Act in a fair and efficient manner. The costs associated with a rail movement in comparison to the revenue generated by the movement, for example, are key factors in determining whether a rail rate is excessive or reasonable.

The Board has never been established as provided under section 302 of the Staggers Rail Act and its authorization has expired. This bill reauthorizes the Board for 3 years and provides funding at a level of $1 million each year. The bill also places a pay cap on the salaries of personnel hired by the Board.

The Board, once appointed, will be an independent entity and responsible to the Congress. The Comptroller General, who will chair the Board, will appoint its members who are to be representatives of the shipping community, the economics profession, the accounting profession, and the rail industry. With this expertise, the Board will be able to objectively develop accurate cost accounting principles.

Testimony received in committee oversight hearings on the implementation of the Staggers Act indicates a continuing need for this Board. Statements from representatives of the utility and shipping industries support its creation. The Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission believes the Board, once established, could play a meaningful oversight role to the Commission's present cost accounting system. Neither the administration nor the rail industry has expressed any opposition to the creation of this Board.

Mr. Speaker, the Railroad Accounting Principles Board has an important place in the successful deregulation of the rail industry. The Board was an integral part of the Staggers Act.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Thank you.●

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FLORIO) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4439.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill, H.R. 4439, the Clerk be authorized to correct section numbers, punctuation, and cross references and to make such other technical and conforming changes as may be necessary to reflect the actions of the House in passing that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

WATER RESOURCES RESEARCH ACT OF 1983

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 684) to authorize an ongoing program of water resources research, with a Senate amendment to the House amendments, and concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment to the House amendments, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment to the text of the bill, insert:

TITLE I

SEC. 101. This Act may be cited as the "Water Resources Research Act of 1983".

SEC. 102. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the existence of an adequate supply of water of good quality for the production of materials and energy for the Nation's needs and for the efficient use of the Nation's energy and water resources is essential to national economic stability and growth, and to the well-being of the people;

(2) the management of water resources is closely related to maintaining environmental quality and social well-being;

(3) there is an increasing threat of impairment to the quantity and quality of surface and groundwater resources;

(4) the Nation's capabilities for technological assessment and planning and for policy formulation for water resources must be strengthened at the Federal, State, and local governmental levels;

(5) there should be a continuing national investment in water and related research and technology commensurate with growing national needs;

(6) it is necessary to provide for the research and development of technology for the conversion of saline and other impaired waters to a quality suitable for municipal, industrial, agricultural, recreational, and other beneficial uses; and

(7) the Nation must provide programs to strengthen research and associated graduate education because the pool of scientists, engineers, and technicians trained in fields related to water resources constitutes an invaluable natural resource which should be increased, fully utilized, and regularly replenished.

SEC. 103. It is the purpose of this Act to assist the Nation and the States in augmenting their water resources science and technology as a way to—

(1) assure supplies of water sufficient in quantity and quality to meet the Nation's expanding needs for the production of food, materials, and energy;

(2) discover practical solutions to the Nation's water and water resources related problems, particularly those problems related to impaired water quality;

(3) assure the protection and enhancement of environmental and social values in connection with water resources management and utilization;

(4) promote the interest of State and local governments as well as private industry in research and the development of technology that will reclaim waste water and to convert saline and other impaired waters to waters suitable for municipal, industrial, agricultural, recreational, and other beneficial uses;

(5) coordinate more effectively the Nation's water resources research program; and

(6) promote the development of a cadre of trained research scientists, engineers, and technicians for future water resources problems.

SEC. 104. (a) Subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") under this section, one water resources research and technology institute, center, or equivalent agency (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "institute") may be established in each State (as used in this Act, the term "State" includes the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Mariana Islands and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands) at a college or university which was established in accordance with the Act approved July 2, 1862 (12 Stat. 503; 7 U.S.C. 301ff), entitled "An Act donating public lands to the several States and territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts" or at some other institution designated by act of the legislature of the State concerned. If there is more than one such college or university in a State established in accordance with such Act of July 2, 1862, the institute in such State shall, in the absence of a designation to the contrary by act of the legislature of the State, be established at the one such college or university designated by the Governor of the State. Two or more States may cooperate in the establishment of a single institute or regional institute, in which event the sums otherwise allocated to institutes in each of the cooperating States shall be paid to such single or regional institute.

(b) Each institute shall—

(1) plan, conduct, or otherwise arrange for competent research with respect to water resources, including investigations and experiments of either a basic or practical nature, or both; promote the dissemination and application of the results of these efforts; and provide for the training of scientists and engineers through such research, investigations, and experiments, and

(2) cooperate closely with other colleges and universities in the State that have demonstrated capabilities for research, information dissemination, and graduate training in order to develop a statewide program designed to resolve State and regional water and related land problems.

Each institute shall also cooperate closely with other institutes and other organizations in the region to increase the effectiveness of the institutes and for the purpose of regional coordination.

(c) From the sums appropriated pursuant to subsection (f) of this section, the Secretary shall make grants to each institute to be matched on a basis of no less than one non-Federal dollar for every Federal dollar during the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, and September 30, 1986, one and one-half non-Federal dollars for each Federal dollar during the fiscal years ending September 30, 1987, and September 30, 1988, and two non-Federal dollars for each Federal dollar during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989.

(d) Prior to and as a condition of the receipt each fiscal year of funds appropriated under subsection (f) of this section, each institute shall submit to the Secretary for his approval a water research program that includes assurances, satisfactory to the Secretary, that such program was developed in close consultation and collaboration with the director of that State's department of water resources or similar agency, other leading water resources officials within the State, and interested members of the public. The program described in the preceding sentence shall include plans to promote research, training, information dissemination, and other activities meeting the needs of the State and Nation, and shall encourage regional cooperation among institutes in research into areas of water management, development, and conservation that have a regional or national character.

(e)(1) The Secretary shall establish procedures for a careful and detailed evaluation of each institute to determine that the quality and relevance of its water resources research and its effectiveness as an institution for planning, conducting and arranging for research warrants its continued support under this section in the national interest. The evaluation of each institute shall be made by a team of knowledgeable individuals including employees of the Department of the Interior, university faculty or administrators, water research institute directors from other institutes, State or local water resource agency personnel, and private citizens selected for this purpose. The Secretary may also secure the cooperation of the National Research Council/National Academy of Science. The evaluation team shall visit the institute and shall assess the scientific quality of its research program, the potential effectiveness of its research in meeting water resource needs, and the demonstrated performance in making research results available to users in the State and elsewhere. Criteria for making the determination that an institute is an effective instrument for water resources research shall include the following: accreditation in sufficient disciplines to successfully mount a multidisciplinary research program; sufficient resources, including laboratory, library, computer, and support facilities; a sufficiently close administrative relation and physical proximity to the university and to all the parts of it needed to provide an effective working relationship with researchers in a wide range of disciplines; and institutional commitment to the support and continuation of an effective water research program.

(2) The Secretary shall arrange for each of the institutes supported under this section to be evaluated under this subsection within two years after its establishment and to be reevaluated at intervals not to exceed four years. If, as a result of any such evaluation, the Secretary determines that an institute does not qualify for further support under this section, then no further grants to the institute may be made until the institute's qualification is reestablished to the satisfaction of the Secretary.

(f)(1) For the purpose of carrying out this section, there is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary the sum of $10,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, through September 30, 1989, such sums to remain available until expended.

(2) Any sums appropriated under this subsection but which fail to be obligated by the close of the fiscal year for which they were appropriated shall be transferred by the Secretary and available for obligation during the succeeding fiscal year under the terms of section 106 of this Act.

SEC. 105. (a)(1) In addition to the grants authorized by section 104 of this Act, the Secretary is authorized to make grants, on a dollar-for-dollar matching basis, to the institutes established under such section, as well as other qualified educational institutions, private foundations, private firms, individuals, and agencies of local or State government for research concerning any aspect of a water resource-related problem which the Secretary may deem to be in the national interest. Such grants shall be made with such advice and review by peer or other expert groups of appropriate interdisciplinary composition as the Secretary deems appropriate on the basis of the merits of the project and the need for the knowledge such project is expected to produce upon completion.

(2) Research funded under this section should to the extent possible utilize the best qualified graduate students so the Nation profits from the education and training benefits resulting from the use of the latest in technological developments in solving water problems.

(3) In cases where the Secretary determines, in accordance with criteria established by him, that research under this section is of a basic nature which would not otherwise be undertaken, the Secretary may approve grants under this section with a matching requirement other than that specified in paragraph (1) of this subsection.

(b) Each application for a grant under this section shall state the nature of the project to be undertaken, the period during which it will be pursued, the qualifications of the personnel who will direct and conduct it, the importance of the project to the Nation as well as to the region and State concerned, its relation to other research projects previously or currently being pursued, and the extent to which it will provide an opportunity for the training of water resources scientists.

(c) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary the sum of $20,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out this section for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, through September 30, 1989, such sums to remain available until expended.

SEC. 106. (a)(1) The Secretary shall make grants or contracts in addition to those authorized under sections 104 and 105 to educational institutions, private firms, private foundations, individuals, and agencies of local or State governments for technology development concerning any aspect of water-related technology which the Secretary may deem to be of State, regional, and national importance, including technology associated with improvement of waters of impaired quality and the operation of test facilities. Such grants or contracts shall be made on the basis of the merit and feasibility of the project based on expert evaluation as deemed appropriate by the Secretary, taking care to protect proprietary information of private firms or individuals associated with the technology.

(2) The Secretary may establish any condition for the matching of funds by the recipient of any grant or contract under this section which the Secretary considers to be in the best interest of the Nation considering the technology needs for water resources in the Nation.

(b) Each application for a grant or contract under this section shall state the nature of the project to be undertaken, the qualifications of the personnel who will direct and conduct it, the facilities of the organization performing the technology development, the importance of the project to the Nation, region, and State concerned, and the potential benefit to be accrued from the development.

(c)(1) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary the sum of $6,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out this section for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, through September 30, 1989, such sums to remain available until expended.

(2) In addition to sums available under the terms of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary is also authorized to obligate funds under this section if such funds are transferred under the terms of section 104(f)(2) of this Act.

SEC. 107. From the sums appropriated pursuant to this Act, not more than 15 per centum shall be utilized for administrative costs.

SEC. 108. The type of research and development to be undertaken under the authority of sections 105 and 106 of this Act and to be encouraged by the institutes established under section 104 of this Act shall include the following:

(1) Aspects of the hydrologic cycle;

(2) Supply and demand for water;

(3) Demineralization of saline and other impaired waters;

(4) Conservation and best use of available supplies of water and methods of increasing such supplies;

(5) Water reuse;

(6) Depletion and degradation of groundwater supplies;

(7) Improvements in the productivity of water when used for agricultural, municipal, and commercial purposes;

(8) The economic, legal, engineering, social, recreational, biological, geographic, ecological, and other aspects of water problems;

(9) Scientific information dissemination activities, including identifying, assembling, and interpreting the results of scientific and engineering research on water resources problems; and

(10) Providing means for improved communication of research results, having due regard for the varying conditions and needs for the respective States and regions.

SEC. 109. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary shall be governed by the provisions of sections 9 (except subsections (l) and (n)) and 10 of the Federal Nonnuclear Energy, Research, and Development Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-577; 88 Stat. 1887, 1891; 42 U.S.C. 5908-5909) with respect to patent policy and to the definition of title to and licensing of inventions made or conceived in the course of work performed, or under any contract or grant made, pursuant to this Act. Subject to such patent policy, all research or development contracted for, sponsored, cosponsored, or authorized under authority of this Act shall be provided in such manner that all information, data, and know-how, regardless of their nature or mediums, resulting from such research and development shall (with such exceptions and limitations, if any, as the Secretary may find to be necessary in the interest of national defense) be usefully available for practice by the general public.

SEC. 110. (a) Public Law 95-467 is repealed.

(b) Rules and regulations issued prior to the date of enactment of this Act under the authority of Public Law 95-467 shall remain in full force and effect under this Act until superseded by new rules and regulations promulgated under this Act.

SEC. 111. Any new spending authority described in subsection (c)(2) (A) or (B) of section 401 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 which is provided under this Act shall be effective for any fiscal year only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriations Acts.

Mr. McNULTY (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been cleared with the leadership on this side of the aisle, but I would ask that the gentleman from Arizona briefly describe the bill, if he would.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McNULTY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I thank my good friend from Colorado.

Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with the establishment and the authorization of water institutes and land-grant institutions. As passed from here on the suspension calendar, it contained the provision for expenditures or authorization of expenditures totaling $60 million a year. At the time the matter came before the body, an agreement had been reached in principle by all interested parties and I advised this body that it was my intention to seek a reduction in the total authorization to $36 million from the $60 million.

So the Senate, based on those representations, in its own good judgment, did in fact reduce the total to the $36 million. In addition, it made the public purpose reversion clause indefinite with respect to the other feature of the bill which conveyed Federal desalting facilities to Wrightsville Beach, N.C., and the city of Roswell in New Mexico.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I thank my friend for his explanation, and I join him in urging adoption of the amendments.

Mr. McNULTY. If the gentleman will yield further, I appreciate that from one of the important cosponsors of this bill.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) to dispense with the reading?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the original request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING CERTAIN LANDS TO BE HELD IN TRUST FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE PAIUTE INDIAN TRIBE OF UTAH

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2898) to declare certain lands to be held in trust for the benefit of the Paiute Indian Tribe of Utah, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out "Act are the parcels of land" and inert "section are parcels 1 through 5 of the lands".

Page 8, line 5, after "appropriated" insert "in fiscal year 1985".

SEC. 6. The plan for the use or distribution of funds awarded the Creek Nation in docket numbers 169 and 272 before the Indian Claims Commission and in docket numbers 277 and 309-74 before the United States Court of Claims, and the plan for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Sisseton-Wahpeton Sioux in docket numbered 363 before the United States Court of Claims, which were submitted to the Congress by the Department of the Interior for consideration under the provisions of the Judgment Fund Distribution Act of 1973 (87 Stat. 466; 25 U.S.C. 1401 et seq.) are hereby declared to be valid and effective as of the date of enactment of this Act and such plans are declared to have been validly submitted and are exempted from any further review.

Mr. McNULTY (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the original request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I simply rise at this time in complete support of this bill and the Senate amendments which have been attached to it which are technical in nature.

In 1954, Congress terminated the legal relationship between the Utah Paiute Tribe of Utah and the Government. These Indians accepted termination largely because their Representatives in Congress promised them that their lands would not be taxed. That promise was not kept, and as a result they lost over 16,000 acres of their land.

Enactment of H.R. 2898 would fulfill the promise of a 1980 act of Congress that restored federally recognized status to the Paiute Indian Tribe.

H.R. 2898 is the product of over 10 years' effort by the tribe not only to regain their status as a tribe and the land they lost through termination, but also to obtain the means by which to make genuine progress toward economic self-sufficiency.

I am pleased to say that there is broad popular support in Utah for the tribe and for this legislation. The entire State delegation, the Governor, county commissioners, local governments, the tribe, as well as the Department of the Interior, the House, and administration support enactment of H.R. 2898.

The Senate passed this with amendments and we have accepted them. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of H.R. 2898.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) for his efforts in making this a reality.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARRIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McNULTY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my good friend from Utah. The bill is an opportunity for the decency which was expressed by the body and is a great compliment to the constructive purposefulness of my friend from Utah (Mr. MARRIOTT).

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2898 provides for the transfer of certain Federal lands to the Paiute Indian Tribe of Utah. This transfer is in fulfillment of the commitment that the Congress made in the 1980 act restoring this tribe to Federal recognition.

The bill passed the House on October 23, 1983, under suspension of the rules. The Senate passed the bill on November 18, 1983, with three amendments.

The first two amendments are minor and clarifying in nature and were not opposed by the Department.

The second amendment is a nongermane amendment. It would statutorily approve two plans submitted by the administration for the distribution of funds awarded to the Creek Indian Nation and two Sioux tribes. These two plans had been submitted to the Congress for review under the Indian Judgment Distribution Act. The amendment was adopted because of the impending long holiday adjournment of Congress. The expectation was that the House would concur in the amendment prior to adjournment of the first session. However, the bill was not returned to the House before it adjourned.

Since the convening of the second session, the review time on these two plans has run and the plans are legally effective.

While enactment of this amendment into law would have no legal effect whatsoever, the decision was made to simply concur in this moot provision to avoid further delay of enactment which would result from sending the bill back to the Senate with a further amendment.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in response to a concern expressed by the Agriculture Department about a provision of H.R. 2898 relating to certain exclusive use periods of forest lands by the tribe, I would like to state, for the purpose of legislature history, that the responsibilities of the Department under this provision could be met by implementing its current regulations under sections 261.50 and 261.51 of title 36, Code of Federal Regulations.

Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the original request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 2898 and S. 684.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS POLICY ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 275, and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 555.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 555) to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress through rate increases, with Mr. DORGAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER).

□ 1420

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, today the House begins consideration of what may well be the most important piece of consumer energy legislation to be brought before the 98th Congress, H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act.

For many Members, I am sure, construction work in progress, or CWIP, will seem like an esoteric subject. But to all of their constituents, I assure the Members, it is not a remote or esoteric subject at all.

The question of whether the cost of construction of powerplants, the financing costs, should be borne by the investors during construction, the shareholders of the company, or be borne by the consumers, is one of really critical concern to the consumers of America.

Construction work in progress in rate base, as permitted by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, will result in an increased overall cost to the consumer, but much more importantly, those costs will be borne as they are incurred and the risk will be shifted from the shareholders, who stand to make all the profits, to the consumers, who do not stand to enjoy a participation in those profits.

Let me describe briefly what H.R. 555 would do and give the credit that is well deserved to the Representative from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) for his authorship and interest in this subject over now a period of several years.

H.R. 555 would establish policies and procedures to govern applications by electric utilities to include the cost of construction of work in progress in rate bases regulated by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission under the Federal Power Act.

Construction work in progress, CWIP as it is known, refers to the costs incurred by an electric utility in the construction of a new facility, usually a powerplant, while the facility is under construction and before it is placed in service to the ratepayers.

When CWIP is allowed in the rate base ratepayers start paying the carrying or finance charges on the costs incurred to build the new powerplant while it is under construction and before it has generated any electricity whatsoever.

As many of my colleagues are aware, there have been many powerplants that have been canceled by the utilities because they were unsound investments over recent years. Actually, 100 powerplants have been canceled that were to go forward in the past 10 years. Many of these were actually under construction before they were canceled. Had CWIP for these powerplants been in rate base, consumers would have been required to have borne a portion of the burden of constructing those powerplants, even though the management and the shareholders had made an unsound decision to proceed with that plant and the plant had never generated a single kilowatthour of electricity.

Therefore, the consumers, our constituents, would be stuck with costs which they should not have to incur, that ought properly to be risks of the private enterprise that stands to reap the benefits.

When CWIP is placed in the rate base, ratepayers pick up a portion of the financial risk associated with the utility's investment program in a manner not replicated in the unregulated market. It should not be surprising that CWIP in the rate base thus encourages utilities to build facilities that otherwise they might find too risky.

The ones that most concern me are long leadtime capital-intensive powerplants, the incremental need for which is questionable at least at this point in time.

I think that this effect on utility decisionmaking is precisely the opposite of what sound regulation should be trying to do now. And that is to encourage utilities to assess and invest in less risky, shorter payback, and less capital-intensive resources, such as efficiency improvements, cogeneration, and other alternatives.

There is overwhelming evidence that these resources exist in abundance everywhere in the United States. The Library of Congress has estimated that the country can save itself about $450 billion if we invest in these alternative resources rather than meet the demand by building hundreds of new powerplants.

But if CWIP is routinely let in the rate base it will encourage utilities to avoid assessing and investing in less costly resources and impel them to begin a new round of powerplant construction. And our experience there has been that those utilities that overbuild put themselves in financial jeopardy.

This is exactly the stated and wrongheaded purpose of the new FERC rule respecting CWIP which H.R. 555 would overturn, that is, the FERC rule automatically permits to be put in the rate base 50 percent of the costs of a new powerplant, regardless of the need of the utility for that consumer financing.

In March of last year, the FERC adopted a new CWIP rule, which, as I say, routinely allows utilities to place 50 percent of their costs of construction in FERC rate bases without even showing that the investment program ratepayers will help finance by CWIP is a sound one economically.

Already this rule has resulted in at least one application to include CWIP in rate base for a powerplant that its owners want to cancel. Without question, this FERC rule is intended to encourage utilities to build more of the very powerplants whose high costs and large capacities are too big for most utilities to swallow. This terrible regulatory policy convinced me and many others in Congress to pursue this and to try to rectify the unfortunate aspects of the FERC ruling.

Fortunately the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN), who is the author of this legislation originally, had begun his research into CWIP, not in this Congress but the beginning of the last Congress, when FERC first announced it was thinking of changing its CWIP regulation.

Our subcommittee held a hearing then and held another hearing on this matter in this present Congress. We followed up our initial findings with significant staff work and this has resulted in a revised bill which is before the committee today.

In these hearings we established that CWIP primarily increases the cash flow for a utility. In short, we learned that CWIP in the rate base can be of help to a utility that is short on cash to meet needed construction expenditures and that at some point, when cash flow gets low, the utility cannot borrow except at high interest rate, CWIP in the rate base will not only help the utility, but can be in the interest of ratepayers as well. Only, of course, when the investment being financed by CWIP in the rate base is reasonably necessary to meet demand at the lowest cost.

With these thoughts in mind, the subcommittee, with the support of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN), molded a fresh approach to CWIP, one that directs the FERC to permit CWIP in the rate base for utilities whose cash flow is so low that it cannot get a double A bond rating and whose cost of new long-term debt is significantly above the industry average.

And we require that a utility requesting CWIP show that it has assessed conservation, cogeneration, and other alternatives to new powerplants. To build a new powerplant is almost always the reason why a utility seeks CWIP in the rate base.

For utilities in severe financial difficulty, we direct the FERC to give CWIP in rate base immediately after showing their financial distress.

Utilities that cannot make that showing have to prove their case first in hearings.

I think this is a moderate approach to CWIP, one that takes account that CWIP in rate base is generally not a good idea because of the signals it sends to utilities and because of the burdens it places on ratepayers, which shareholders should properly bear.

However, H.R. 555 also acknowledges that at some point CWIP in the rate base can be in the interest of consumers, in situations where the cash flow of the utility is insufficient to be able to finance truly needed new capital construction.

There are those who believe that we conceded too much in framing this compromise. There are others who think we have gone too far. I think we take a very sensible position that is squarely in the middle and is a moderate approach, that is, to permit CWIP where a showing of true financial need is made and where it can be shown that this is a needed least-cost facility to the utility and not permitting CWIP where that kind of showing cannot be made.

The legislation is supported by a huge variety of groups, virtually all of the environmental and consumer groups in the country, various industry groups, labor groups. I will read a complete listing of them:

The American Paper Institute; the American Association of Retired Persons; the American Public Power Association; the Citizen-Labor Energy Coalition; the Consumer Energy Council of America; the Consumer Federation of America; Consumers Union; Environmental Action; Environmental Policy Institute; Friends of the Earth; the National Association of State Utility Consumer Advocates; the National Consumers League; the National Council of Senior Citizens. This, of course, is particulary important to senior citizens. Many senior citizens affected by putting construction work in progress into the rate base are very likely not to live to be able to get any benefits from the plant so financed whatsoever; the National Farmers Union; National Rural Electric Cooperative Association; the National Resources Defense Council; Sierra Club; the United Auto Workers; the United Methodist Church; Board of Church and Society; and the United Steel Workers of America.

I think this is sensible, sound legislation, and I strongly urge its adoption.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge a "no" vote on this bill. H.R. 555 would irresponsibly repeal a rule carefully crafted by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. The Commissioners unanimously determined that this rule was necessary to insure economic and reliable electric utility service.

The FERC rule allows a utility to file for cash recovery of carrying or financing charges only on 50 percent of a utility's construction work in progress (CWIP). None of the principal investment in new facilities may be recovered until after the new plant is placed in service. Furthermore, FERC placed a consumer protective cap of 6 percent per year on any rate increase attributable to this rule. The FERC rule affects only 10 percent of all sales of electricity by privately owned electric companies in the United States.

This FERC rule was a limited, yet important regulatory reform that was instituted only after 20 years of extensive hearings. A total of over 200 interested parties—including utilities, wholesale purchasers, and consumer groups—participated in these hearings. The utilities insisted that 100 percent of recovery of ACWIP in the rate base was essential, while others wanted no CWIP in the rate base.

FERC promulgated a compromise rule which limited inclusion of CWIP financing charges in the rate base to one-half of such charges incurred by the utility. This rule is a sound and fair compromise that enables a utility to recover at least part of the financing charges while a plant is being built.

The FERC rule was designed to promote several benefits. Sooner or later, whether under H.R. 555 or the FERC rule, ratepayers will pay all of the financing charges, as well as the principal, for utility construction projects. The FERC rule, however, insures that ratepayers will ultimately pay less by eliminating the need to capitalize all of the financing charges. Under H.R. 555, the utilities would have to borrow additional amounts of money merely to pay the interest on the funds they borrowed for construction. In contrast, the FERC rule permits the utility to place 50 percent of the financing charges into the rate base. This reduces the amount of funds the utility must borrow and subsequently finance.

The FERC rule also minimizes "rate shock." Under the FERC rule, utility customers gradually adjust to the cost of new plants as 50 percent of financing costs are placed immediately into the rate base. This practice will assist in establishing rates that more accurately reflect the cost of new generating capacity. This could encourage conservation and alert utilities more readily that additional plant investment is unnecessary.

The FERC rule also reduces the regulatory bias discouraging the construction of new generating facilities. A major study on our Nation's need for new electrical generating capacity was released by DOE last summer. This report identified the rate treatment of CWIP as one of the significant financial disincentives causing concern about the electric power industry's willingness and ability to invest in the generating capacity necessary to meet our Nation's future energy needs.

Mr. Chairman, proponents of H.R. 555 apparently feel that they are somehow going to help the ratepayer by making it more costly for a utility to build a powerplant. This is obviously not the case. If enacted, H.R. 555 would harm our Nation's ratepayers in the following ways:

First, H.R. 555 would establish a new set of procedural hurdles which would make it impossible for most utilities to include financial costs for CWIP in the rate base.

Second, H.R. 555 would result in higher utility rates over the life of a powerplant.

Third, H.R. 555 would result in "rate shock" as the imposition of the full cost of powerplants on ratepayers will be postponed until the plant commences operation.

Fourth, H.R. 555 would discourage utilities from undertaking investments in more efficient and economical plants.

Fifth, H.R. 555 would pose a serious threat to the availability of adequate electricity service for this Nation's continued economic growth and prosperity.

Sixth, H.R. 555's disincentives to utility investment will prevent investment in alternatives to oil- and gas-fired facilities, thereby perpetuating America's dependence on foreign imports.

Seventh, H.R. 555 will undo a necessary and carefully considered regulatory reform action by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and replace it with a complex, cumbersome, and palpably unworkable regulatory nightmare.

I have a letter from the Secretary of Energy strongly opposing H.R. 555, stating:

> We support the recent FERC rulemaking on construction in progress. It is a responsible and well-reasoned step which recognizes the difficulties utility companies face today in financing the electric power investments which will sustain our economy in the future. The FERC rulemaking is supportive of the national energy policy goal of asserting an adequate and diverse energy policy supply at a reasonable cost, as expressed in a recent national energy policy plan.

I also have a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Energy Commission, saying:

> The final rule in Order No. 298 represents years of experience dealing with the cost of financing utility plant as it impacts wholesale electric rates. I believe it is a judicious reform of the anomalous practice of excluding from rate base the cost of financing ongoing construction programs. Not only did the "financial distress" test for CWIP, which was abandoned by the Commission, afford the industry little assistance in a time of economic hardship and stop-gap regulatory policies, it did not enable utilties to prepare to meet the demands of the future.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 555 would frustrate the fulfillment of FERC's regulatory responsibility. The proponents of H.R. 555 would have Congress substitute its judgment for FERC's expertise and over 2 years of comprehensive study based on 1 day of consideration by the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee. We cannot afford to ignore the warnings of Federal energy experts. I urge you not to inflict this law on our Nation and its ratepayers. Vote "no" on H.R. 555.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WEAVER).

Mr. Chairman, I would point out that in this region we have had more catastrophic effects of overbuilding of powerplants than any other region of the country.

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the Chairman and my good friend, the gentleman from New York, whose work in this field has been exemplary and most valuable, and I compliment him for bringing this bill out.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in Oregon we passed a construction work in progress bill back in the late 1970's by initiative, and the people voted overwhelmingly for this initiative. And thank godness they did, because it has saved the people hundreds of millions of dollars.

Now, again, if we say, "Well, gosh, the utilities there plan plants at Pebble Springs, plants at Skagit in Washington State and also built the famous WPPSS plants in Washington State, why should not the consumer pay for this?"

The whole point of the construction work in progress bill is not just to save the consumer money for the mistakes of the utility. The most important thing we do is to keep the utility from having a blank check to spend money to build plants whether they are needed or not. In other words, it is actually a part of the market force.

Without construction work in progress, the utility simply passes its costs on to the consumer, as they have done in the Northwest. In the Northwest, our rates have doubled, doubled again and doubled again, simply because of people like the very gentleman that my friend from California just spoke about, the Secretary of Energy, Mr. Don Hodel, when he was Bonneville Power Administrator. When Mr. Hodel was Bonneville Power Administrator, he was the one who pushed the blank check to build WPPSS and the utility industry did not care how much they cost or whether they were needed or not, these plants because they could just simply pass the costs on to their consumers.

If we insinuate CWIP into the process, as we have done in Oregon, the utility must go back and think about the effects on its stockholders. Once they began thinking about the effects on the stockholders, the private utilities, the so-called investor-owned utilities, called public utilities in this bill, decided not to build the plants at Pebble Springs and Skagit, thereby saving their people hundreds of millions of dollars. The market began to work.

Now, it is shocking to know that in the mid-1970's when Mr. Hodel was Bonneville Power Administrator, the projections of load growth in the Northwest were made by Bonneville and the utilities without using price as a factor. They did not even crank in price. They thought no matter how high the price of electricity got, the people of the Northwest would continue to use just as much electricity.

There were dozens of us, ranging from politicians such as myself to experts, to architectural firms, to Oregon State energy agencies, who warned the utilities that we are not going to need these plants; that as the price rises, people will use less and we will have a surplus. But the utilities went right on and built WPPSS and now, not 1 kilowatt hour has been produced by WPPSS and we have a 2,000-megawatt surplus in the Northwest. We would have thousands more megawatts in surplus if it were not for the fact that construction work in progress required the utilities to be much more careful, much more cautious in projecting additional plants and continuing to build Skagit.

So this bill says, "Look, remember your stockholders and be cautious about committing your funds. Make sure your projections for load growth are correct, and do not just expect a blank check from the consumer to go on and build your empire."

So I say to the Members of this House, Mr. Chairman, this bill is badly and sorely needed not only to protect the consumer but to assure that the utilities are not given a blank check and let the market, therefore, work its will. But also, I would like to say that I would like to see this bill strengthened and made much stronger, apply, as it does in Oregon, to retail and apply much more broadly across the board.

With that, I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL), the ranking Republican on the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

Mr. BROYHILL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 555.

I am convinced that this legislation, if passed, would increase the costs of utility powerplants and raise consumer utility bills over the long term.

The financing costs of new generating capacity can only be recovered by a utility in one of two ways: First, include the financing costs, or a portion of such costs, of construction work in progress in the rate base; or second, borrow to pay those financing costs and make the ratepayer begin to pay all of the accumulated financing charges and all of the capital costs immediately when the plant comes online. Let there be no misunderstanding—sooner or later—under either method—the ratepayer pays all of the costs of new utility construction. The question is when the ratepayer will begin paying for that construction.

In most all cases under H.R. 555, the ratepayer would be forced to begin paying for all capital costs and all accumulated carrying costs all at once—when the plant is placed in service. This means that the utility—over perhaps a 10- to 14-year construction period—would have to borrow to pay those financing costs and borrow to pay the interest on those financing costs, and so on, over the full construction period. At current interest rates, this latter method which forces the utility to borrow and compound all financing costs means that the ratepayer would typically end up paying three times as much for the financing costs of a new powerplant.

H.R. 555 would, in almost all cases, force the utility to borrow all of its financing charges to pay for construction work in progress. These charges would accumulate and grow and would be placed into the rate base along with the entire capital costs of the plant as soon as the plant comes online. This was precisely the method abandoned by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. According to FERC, that method resulted in a "rate shock" of 30 percent or more to electricity consumers in some cases. Rate shocks are large and sudden consumer rate increases. This is what FERC is trying to minimize with its current rule. H.R. 555 would prevent FERC from doing this. This makes absolutely no sense to me.

We are told that the "borrow now—pay later" approach, even though more costly, is best because it will discourage utilities from building capital-intensive generating plants. I agree that H.R. 555 will act as a disincentive to such investment, but is this wise policy?

A growing set of disincentives to utility investment has already resulted in the cancellation of many plants around the country and despite the current excess reserve capacity which is available in certain regions of the country today, many energy experts are warning that these reserves could dry up quickly in a growing economy, and electricity shortages could develop as early as 1990. The Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power held a hearing on this issue today, and all of the witnesses on every side of this question agreed that predicting future demand for electricity is a highly uncertain business. Nevertheless, it seems very apparent that—due to growth in the Nation's economy, discovery of new uses for electricity, and substitution of electricity for direct use of fuels—demand for electricity will continue to grow. Furthermore, many of our current generating plants were built shortly after World War II. These plants are nearing the end of their useful life and must be replaced. DOE estimates that, even if electricity demand grows at just 3 percent a year, it will cost the utilities $1 trillion to build and replace the powerplants needed by the year 2000.

Legislation such as H.R. 555 will prevent utilities from raising this vital capital, thus sowing the seeds of electricity shortages in the future. These shortages will hurt the poor, the disadvantaged, and the elderly in a disproportionate manner, and will drive domestic manufacturing jobs to foreign countries where electricity is less expensive. By making it more costly to build powerplants, H.R. 555 would prevent old and inefficient oil-burning generating plants from being replaced by more economical and efficient nonoil plants. This will increase American dependency on interruptible supplies of imported oil and raise costs of electricity even higher in the future. H.R. 555 is certainly not in the best interest of the consumer or the country.

There are those who think that providing disincentives for utility construction is a good way to force utilities to turn to smaller and supposedly less costly generating technologies, such as wind, solar, hydroelectric, and geothermal. However, despite progress in all of these important alternative energy technologies, they are highly unlikely to supply the huge electricity demands of a growing and productive America. I do not believe that we can afford to risk the disaster which would be caused by inadequate and unreliable electricity supplies.

Energy experts at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and at the Department of Energy have warned of the dangers of H.R. 555. Both agree that H.R. 555 would increase consumer costs, threaten the long-term availability of adequate and reliable electricity, and increase our dependence on imported oil.

I do not believe that Congress should take these warnings lightly. I urge my colleagues to study this complex bill carefully. If you are uncertain of the effect of any of its provisions, I urge you to withhold your support.

I believe this legislation would add to the already heavy burden on the Nation's ratepayers and threaten our economic future. This bill should be defeated. I urge my colleagues to vote "no" on H.R. 555.

At this point in the RECORD, I include a letter from the Secretary of Energy, the Honorable Donald Hodel. The Secretary argues that passage of H.R. 555 would result in consumers getting hit with rate shock and would act as a disincentive "to employ technologies with lower operating costs."

The letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF ENERGY,
Washington, D.C., February 6, 1984.

Hon. JAMES T. BROYHILL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BROYHILL: The Committee on Energy and Commerce has approved for full House consideration a bill (H.R. 555) to regulate the inclusion of the costs of Construction-Work-in-Progress (CWIP) in electric utility rate bases under the jurisdiction of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC). The proposed legislation would reverse a recent unanimous FERC rulemaking, made after extensive consideration and public comment, that allows up to 50 percent of a utility company's construction expenditures to be included in its rate base as these expenses are incurred, subject to strict conditions.

The Department of Energy opposes H.R. 555. The exclusion of Construction-Work-in-Progress from the rate base can lead to distorted investment decisions by raising the cost of capital-intensive resources. By accumulating the interest costs during construction of new generating facilities, consumers end up paying interest on interest and getting hit with "rate shock" when new capital-intensive facilities are put into service. Because of the difficulty in financing the higher capital cost, H.R. 555 would provide a disincentive to employ technologies with lower operating costs, such as hydro, solar, wind, and nuclear power. They will rely instead on low capital cost but fuel-intensive technologies, such as those that burn oil and gas. By discouraging those technologies which offer a cost-effective alternative to oil and gas as a generating fuel, H.R. 555 would reduce the balance and diversity in our nation's electric power system. The unfortunate legacy of such legislation would be higher electricity prices and a less reliable electric power system.

We support the recent FERC rulemaking on Construction-Work-in-Progress. It is a responsible and well-reasoned step which recognizes the difficulties utility companies face today financing the electric power investments which will sustain our economy in the future. The FERC rulemaking is supportive of the national energy policy goal of assuring an adequate and diverse energy supply at a reasonable cost, as expressed in the recent National Energy Policy Plan.

Electricity is a fundamental requirement for long term economic growth. We can not afford legislation which unnecessarily preempts the considered decisions of our regulatory institutions and casts a shadow over the adequacy and efficiency of our nation's electricity supplies. For this reason I urge you to vote against H.R. 555 and to allow the recent FERC rulemaking to stand.

Sincerely,

DONALD PAUL HODEL.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROYHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I understand what the gentleman is saying, that sooner or later the ratepayers are going to have to pay. We all know that. I am going to have some comments of my own later on the floor regarding that.

The problem is that, as the gentleman said, the ratepayers have to pay sooner or later for construction costs. I have no problem with that as long as it is the people who are using it. What I am concerned about is, how about elderly people who may be forced to pay but who will never use any of the power. That does not seem to be a very equitable arrangement.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, the gentleman knows full well that those plants that are generating electricity now, which we are enjoying, were paid for by people who are long gone. That argument just does not fly. These charges accumulate and they grow, and particularly in this day of high interest rates those plants that we have today were built when interest rates were low, 2, 3, or 4 percent. Those were paid for by people who are long gone and we are enjoying the benefits of that lower cost power.

If those plants had not been able to be financed "as-you-go," we would be paying far higher electric costs, and the gentleman knows that full well.

Mr. HARKIN. If the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman has taken what I was saying about CWIP and changed it into the cost of building the plant. We are talking about CWIP. We are talking about the finance and the interest charges for building the plant.

That is not the case today. The people who are using the power today are the ones who are paying the finance and interest charges, not the people who may have financed it through the equity and bond markets, the construction.

Mr. BROYHILL. I am just saying that the way that plants have been built in the past, in most States of our country we had the construction work that was phased in and now we are trying to change all of the rules, it seems.

Mr. HARKIN. If the gentleman will yield further, that is not so in the States with regard to CWIP.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, it may be true in the gentleman's State. I would have to get the list out and take a look at it, but that seems to me to be an entirely different matter. We will just continue this discussion tomorrow.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. Bosco).

Mr. BOSCO. Mr. Chairman, recently the California Public Utilities Commission granted a consumer group the opportunity to place a leaflet in the utility bill statement. The utility company involved protested vociferously and encouraged a number of newspaper editorials decrying this official intrusion of consumer advocacy in the affairs of a private corporation. The utility argued that it was no different than any other private business and has even threatened to go to court and claim that its freedom of speech is being impinged by the allowance of consumer information in the billing statement.

While investor-owned utilities may be making the private enterprise plea back home, it appears that their song is a little different here in Washington. Here they are saying the public should share in their risks long before it is known whether the public will receive benefits from those risks. Here they are advocating a sort of public-private enterprise when it comes to paying for bad management decisions that have resulted in billions of dollars of losses.

This chameleon-like role is nothing new for our Nation's utilities. For some purposes they like to pretend they are private enterprise, empowered to make management decisions behind closed corporate board room doors. Yet when these decisions involve too much risk or when a management decision goes sour they suddenly open their arms to public involvement, especially when it comes to paying the tab.

They cannot have their cake and eat it too, Mr. Chairman. If the investor-owned utilities are private enterprise when it comes to allowing consumer information in the billing statement, then they ought to be private enterprise when it comes to footing the bill for risky management decisions. To take on the consumer as a full partner for the purpose of paying for such decisions, yet ban the consumer from the very board room in which those decisions are made and even from the billing newsletter that purportedly educates the public is a violation of fair play repugnant to most Americans.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD).

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that H.R. 555 is not only anticonsumer legislation, but it is contrary to the best interests of this Nation. I would urge my colleagues to defeat this ill-advised bill. The issue is clear. An independent regulatory agency, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, proposed a modest solution to several serious problems they identified. FERC will allow utilities to include 50 percent of the interest on funds used for powerplant construction work in the rate base for interstate sales of electricity.

It is important to understand that FERC is not permitting the actual construction costs to be included in the rate base, but only half of the interest charges on the funds used for construction. The FERC found that this solution will unquestionably lower the long-term price for electricity paid by the consumer and will reverse several disincentives to certain national policy goals.

I think it is given precept that lower costs of electricity in the long term, rather than higher, long term costs through short-sighted, short-term savings, should be the goals of our national regulatory policy. Additionally, I think it is also easier on the electricity customer to pay a gradually rising rate than it is to have the sudden shock of paying a large rate increase which results in a higher price than if the rates were increased gradually.

The argument has been made that utilities should not be financed by ratepayers to build uneconomic or unneeded facilities. However, if a utility's commitment to a new powerplant is unjustifiable, nothing prevents FERC from refusing to allow CWIP in the rate base. If a plant is to be built, it should be built at the lowest cost consistent with other national interests.

The FERC found that it makes sound business sense to allow a utility to partially recover these interest costs because the consumer will pay a price that more accurately reflects the current cost of providing the service. From a national policy standpoint this allows the marketplace to make more accurate tradeoffs in the choice between conservation and other sources of energy. If electricity is priced below its current cost for production, it artifically skews the market to its favor.

The FERC found that their solution of 50 percent CWIP helps to reverse the counterproductive incentive for utilities to select low capital cost production methods which invariably lead to higher production costs and higher rates to the consumer. The utilities had been faced with a simple choice: build expensive oil and gas fired capacity at a low capital cost and very short leadtimes, or build considerably less expensive coal or nuclear capacity at high capital cost and long leadtimes. The utilities were being pushed into opting for expensive oil and gas production because the cost of raising capital is high and must be raised outside the rate base on the backs of the shareholders.

Additionally, a utility's return on investment is calculated as a percentage of total expenditures, so it quickly becomes obvious that the higher cost production methods will also yield a higher dollar return. This combination of pressures on the utilities were clearly leading them to the path of least resistance and the option of higher cost oil and gas production. This hurts the Nation and ultimately the taxpayer and the consumer.

Certainly, reversing FERC's modest solution to these potentially serious problems is counterproductive. The national policy should continue to create an incentive to be a low cost supplier, and to encourage the most economic use of available energy alternatives like conservation. If this can be done at the same time as we insure a secure supply of electricity, then the Nation, the taxpayer, and the consumer will benefit.

I think this bill is contrary to the national interest and should be defeated.

I urge a negative vote on H.R. 555.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY).

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Act. I believe this legislation is pennywise and pound-foolish. It may result in lower electric rates in the next year or two for some customers, but it will translate into higher rates for those same customers and a possible shortage of electricity for the Nation in the coming years.

The case for CWIP is well made. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has studied the issue at far greater length than was possible for the committee. In no less than 33 States the public utility commissions, as guardians of the consumer have approved CWIP in some form or other. This bill, in effect, would eliminate CWIP as an option in federally-regulated power sales.

The idea of CWIP is to allow a utility to recover some of its financing and construction costs during the period they are building new powerplants or other facilities. That obviously will raise rates in the short run. But by significantly lowering financing costs, CWIP substantially lowers costs over the life of a plant. CWIP also has other beneficial effects: its practice avoids rate shock which would otherwise occur when a large, new facility was added to the rate base in one lump sum. It helps to communicate to the consumer the real value of the power he uses, encouraging appropriate conservation and efficient use of electricity.

Beyond the economic arguments, I would like to point out how grossly unfair this bill would be to my own constituents. The bottom line is that, by being forced to subsidize wholesale customers, the residential consumers in my district may actually be forced to pay higher rates as a result of this bill. This situation may occur because my own State allows CWIP. The State Corporation Commission has determined that the practice is better for consumers. This body is certainly not competent to second-guess that decision. Yet, in H.R. 555, we would demand that the utility which serves my district sell 10 percent of its electricity, to large wholesale customers, without CWIP. So, during the construction of a new plant, my constituents would be left holding the bag for the benefit of a favored few who happen to fall under the Federal Power Act. How much more unfair could we be?

It has been advanced in favor of this bill that CWIP could lead to an orgy of new electricity construction. That claim is unsupportable. In the first place, utilities could not recover their full costs during construction: so there would still be no immediate benefit to starting a new plant. In our experience, in the States, such effects have simply not occurred. In fact, since CWIP was instituted in Virginia, powerplants have been canceled, but in no instance has a utility begun construction on a new plant. Finally, since the Federal jurisdiction is over a small fraction of the power produced in the country, allowing CWIP in the Federal rate base would only have a small, marginal effect on utilities' decisions to build new capacity.

I know that many in this body believe that Washington is the center of the world and that Capitol Hill is the fount of all wisdom. This bill belies those claims. We are not the best qualified body to decide the CWIP issue, and Federal and State consumer protection agencies who have considered the issue have overwhelmingly favored CWIP. Nor are the actions we take going to chart the future of electric capacity planning. Thankfully, that task is in more competent hands. All this bill will do is make things a little harder by creating more bureaucracy, and spread the burden a little more unevenly, in favor of bulk power customers over individual residential consumers. If that is the kind of legislation we want to pass, well, let us go ahead, but we should all be aware of what we are doing.

□ 1500

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee and my good friend, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL).

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act. This is a modest little bill. It is one which responds to a real need.

Construction work in progress, or CWIP, has been an intensely debated issue for many years, and is an extremely important consumer protection issue. It involves the question of whether a public utility which is constructing a new facility, such as an electric powerplant, can charge today's customers some of the costs of that construction, even though the electricity produced might not be available for a decade or even longer. When CWIP is included in a utility's rate base, the utility would earn a cash return on the investment during the construction of a new facility. If it is not included, then the cash return awaits the completion and actual operation of the new facility.

Last year, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission decided to allow the inclusion of 50 percent of construction work in progress costs in utility rate bases for those new powerplants within the Commission's jurisdiction. This represents about 10 percent of the Nation's electricity produced for wholesale sales in interstate commerce. Utilities operating within a State are regulated at the State level. The Commission's ruling was a blanket of CWIP, without regard to the specific financial condition of any utility involved.

Blanket allowance of CWIP—either by the Commission or by State utility commissions—would result in enormous rate increases for utility customers in service areas where new plants are being constructed. Moreover, the ruling follows a period in which the electric utility industry has substantially recovered from earlier financial difficulties. Indeed, between rate increases granted by State commissions and the FERC, and great benefits to utilities from the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, the utility industry on average earned a return of nearly 16 percent on equity during 1982.

In response to the Commission's action, my good friend and colleague TOM HARKIN, of Iowa, introduced H.R. 555 in this Congress. I want to compliment him and the gentleman from New York, Mr. OTTINGER, who chairs my committee's Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power, and who has shepherded the bill through the process thus far.

The bill which the Committee on Energy and Commerce reported, the subject of our consideration today, is a reasonable and balanced approach to restore some fairness to the way in which utilities finance needed new electric-generating capacity. The bill would allow the inclusion of CWIP in the rate base, but it would do so based on a showing by an individual utility that there is financial need, and a justification for inclusion of CWIP. The Commission would be required to deal with the matter on a case-by-case basis, and would have to balance the need of the utility with the need of the utility's current and future ratepayers. I should add that, under this bill, a utility which can demonstrate need could be allowed to place even more than 50 percent of construction work in progress in its rate base.

I know that there has been a great deal of confusion about this issue, and there has been heavy pressure on my colleagues not to adopt this bill at this time. But fairness would dictate that we do adopt this legislation.

Utilities should not be given a blank check to charge current ratepayers for facilities from which they may never benefit. Nor should they be sent a signal by the FERC that building more powerplants—because of the extra financial incentives that flow from a blanket allowance of CWIP—is a sensible course, even if the fact of a major slowing of electricity consumption increases.

There has been a great deal of misrepresentation about what the legislation does and very little understanding of how this bill is an important piece of consumer legislation.

I would like my colleagues to try and understand why we are here with this legislation, what it does, and how the utilities are affected by it.

First of all, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, or FERC, awhile back came forward with a ruling that gave virtually unlimited construction work in progress authority to the electrical utilities. They just go in and they get 50 percent automatically.

Construction work in progress is a useful tool. It is a tool which is recognized by the State regulatory bodies within their own jurisdictions when they permit it. Usually the State regulatory bodies require that there is a showing of need.

With regard to interstate electricity sales, the FERC said that you get CWIP automatically up to 50 percent of the construction costs, without any requirement that there be a showing of need. The legislation before us says that the utilities can get construction work in progress, that they can be paid for the construction work while it is in progress—if there is a showing of need. They do not get it automatically. They are not denied it.

FERC, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, was set up to regulate, to pass on questions of this kind, and to see to it that everybody, the consumers, or ratepayers, and the utilities are treated fairly. There is an argument for making payments to the utilities during the time that construction work is in progress for the construction of new facilities. This bill would permit it.

The only thing that it does is it upsets the rather grandiose and generous action by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission saying that utilities get it automatically. This says they have got to come in and they have got to show that they need it. They will get it to the degree that they need it with regard to the interstate allocation of costs for the construction of new facilities.

What is wrong with that? FERC then carries out its proper and necessary function. The utility is protected. It gets payments to the degree that it needs them for the construction of a new facility, and the consumer is assured that FERC has not simply said: "Consumer, you are going to be paying a lot of money in advance without any showing of need by the utilities."

This is a bill which is fair to the consumer; it is fair to the eiectric utility, and it says to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission members that they are supposed to do something other than sit down there and collect large salaries for doing nothing. It says that they do not prejudge an important question like this, whether or not utilities ought to be paid before they complete the construction for work that may or may not have a benefit to the consumers.

I urge my colleagues to support the legislation. Let us show FERC what its proper responsibilities are. Let us assure the utilities they are going to be fairly treated, and let us tell the consumers that the consumers are not going to be ripped off by a grand, indolent, slothful Federal regulator and a group of utilities that are coming to collect the money for which there is no showing of need nor to which they are entitled. I urge my colleagues to support the legislation.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. RITTER).

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, this grandiose, this generous rule of FERC, to quote my distinguished chairman, allows what? It allows up to 50 percent of CWIP, the finance charges on the construction work in progress up to 50 percent, and has a limit, has a cap of a maximum of 6-percent growth rate per year because of CWIP.

Incidentally, FERC studies have shown that the rate increase due to CWIP is more like about 3.50 percent. But if that half of the finance charge is up to a max of 6 percent is grandiose and generous, I do not know. I think it is just pretty reasonable.

Why is it reasonable? For one thing, if you are an automobile manufacturer in Detroit and you are putting on line a new robot, automated, roboticized, computerized, automated production line and you are financing it at some bank or some banks, you are allowed in the pricing of your present models to take into account the cost of the capital to rebuild, to modernize your product line.

This is the same thing. If we treat utilities as superregulated, totally nonprivate-sector entities when it comes to capital costs and receiving revenues to pay those capital costs, we are going to discourage the rebuilding of our utilities.

Then lo and behold, in States like Michigan, and Pennsylvania, and Ohio we have some older plants and even if you do not want to build any new ones and you are against central-electric-generating capacity, we have older plants that are spewing out pollutants that should be replaced.

H.R. 555 would discourage utilities from constructing the most efficient, economical, and least costly powerplants.

I think we should take a very close look at that, and as the acid-rain question comes down the line here. On the one hand, we are telling the utilities: Do all of this and stuff and we are going to have these band-aids, these magnificent scrubbing band-aids that cost $600 million-$700 million each. But when it comes to new plants, then no one is going to touch it because the capital acquisition charges are such that you cannot reclaim them.

It is not only going to discourage the replacement of some of these older and less efficient, less clean-burning powerplants; it is also going to discourage the construction of alternate fuels, energy technologies such as wind, and solar, and other technologies which do depend, surprise, on large up-front capital investments.

These are capital intensive, not labor intensive, and CWIP and H.R. 555 will discourage these investments in the exact same way it will discourage the investment in a replacement plant for an old coal-burning powerplant.

So I ask my colleagues to go beyond some of the rhetoric we may have heard earlier, go to the heart of the issue, vote against H.R. 555, and you will be doing your ratepayers a favor.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL).

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work In Progress Act.

I also want to commend the fine work on this legislation by our colleague from New York, RICHARD OTTINGER, chairman of the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Energy and Conservation and Power; and my colleague from Iowa, Mr. TOM HARKIN, the original cosponsor of the bill.

□ 1520

I come here because of my interest in small business and my concern that government entities should be required to follow and comply with the laws which we pass.

In implementing the CWIP regulation, the Small Business Council on Advocacy said FERC disregarded the Regulatory Flexibility Act.

The Regulatory Flexibility Act requires agencies to assess the economic impact that their rules and regulations will have on small business and small governmental jurisdictions.

Despite the clear legislative intent of the Regulatory Flexibility Act and the fact that the FERC rule affected more that 900 municipally owned utilities and their customers, this rule went into effect.

The Regulatory Flexibility Act was passed by the Congress to make Federal agencies more accountable for their actions. That FERC should so blatantly disregard the laws of our Nation in my opinion is reason enough for us to pass this legislation.

One of our colleagues said that FERC studied this issue. They may have studied the issue; the question is, What did they do about it? Did they follow the Regulatory Flexibility Act? It is very clear that indeed they did not.

Mr. Chairman, others today will focus their attention to other problems. I wanted to bring these up clearly. I also wanted to mention the fact that in previous debate it was talked about who was going to finance the cost of these new facilities.

I would remind all of our colleagues that in the past there has not been a CWIP. In the past, the people who are receiving the benefits of this construction have been paying for it. Never before have we said the people who are not receiving the benefits are still going to have to pay for it.

I urge support of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, others today will focus their remarks on the many problems inherent in the current Federal Energy Regulatory Commission CWIP policy. I wish to make clear to my colleagues that H.R. 555 is a very moderate measure that closely resembles the previous FERC policy when CWIP was only permitted when private utilities were able to demonstrate a genuine financial need. H.R. 555 will protect the economic concerns of small publicly owned utilities, while also providing private utilities with the financial resources to meet their service obligation. This careful balancing of interests is essential if we are to preserve competition within the electric utility industry.

I would like to include, following my remarks, correspondence I have had with FERC on this issue, together with correspondence from two citizens from my State of Iowa:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., Nov. 21, 1981.

BERKLEY BEDELL,
Chairman, Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I wish to convey my concerns about the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's proposal to allow investor-owned utilities to include construction work in progress (CWIP) expenses in their wholesale rate bases. It is apparent to me that your proposed regulation would have a significant impact not only in my native Iowa, but across the nation.

At the local level, I am concerned about the impact the CWIP proposal will have on municipally-owned utilities and rural electric cooperatives. Concern about the CWIP proposal has been brought to my attention by two officers of the Iowa Association of Municipal Utilities (IAMU). I am enclosing copies of their letters with this letter.

The Executive Director of the IAMU states in his letter to me, "Those municipally owned electric utilities in Iowa who purchase wholesale power from other than public sources serve approximately 300,000 people. Allowing the inclusion of CWIP in a wholesale rate would increase the purchase price our utilities pay. In turn that increase would be reflected in the retail rates of over 10 percent of the population of Iowa."

It is clear from this statement that the inclusion of CWIP in wholesale rate bases will have a direct impact on the financial health of many small utilities—private, public and cooperative—that are dependent upon investor-owned utilities for all or part of their power. Nationwide, these smaller power systems serve a quarter of all America's electric power customers.

A difference in treatment between a utility's wholesale customers, who come under FERC's jurisdiction, and retail customers, covered by state regulators, could impair the competitive position of smaller utilities and create an unequitable sharing of construction costs.

If state public utility commissions do not allow wholesale purchasers of power to pass CWIP expenses on to their customers, these smaller power systems will find themselves in a price squeeze situation. Indeed, several states have denied utility industry requests to pass CWIP expenses on to retail customers. This situation would greatly affect the structure of the nation's power supply system, potentially driving small utilities, including some that are municipally-owned, out of business. If, on the other hand, CWIP expenses are allowed to be passed on to retail customers, residential and small business ratepayers will be forced to foot the bill.

Consequently, the Commission's proposed CWIP regulation is certain to directly affect a substantial number of municipally-owned utilities and rural electric cooperatives, and to indirectly affect many small businesses. Small municipalities, cooperatives and small businesses are explicitly covered by the Regulatory Flexibility Act. Therefore, I find the Commission's one paragraph dismissal of their regulatory flexibility responsibilities in the August 3, 1981 Federal Register unsatisfactory.

As a component of our national energy policy, I feel that the FERC proposal to allow wholesale billing for construction work in progress is misdirected. While I share the Commission's concern about the health of the public utility industry, this proposal may actually worsen the industry's financial position in the long run.

It is my feeling that the poor financial health of certain public utilities is a symptom of their slow response to the new economic realities of the energy marketplace. Even though energy conservation and small-unit power production have contributed to the decline in central power demand, most utilities have not yet become effective marketers of energy efficiency improvements, cogeneration and renewable resource technologies that have become cost competitive with the construction of new central power generating facilities.

As a consequence of their reluctance to actively explore least-cost alternatives for new power supply, many electric utilities have not been able to fully recover their cost of equity capital. This fact has not gone unnoticed in the capital markets. Thus, the financial plight of the public utility industry is, in large part, symptomatic of a broader set of economic developments.

I believe that allowing CWIP expenses to be passed along in wholesale rate bases would artificially improve the cash flow of investor-owned utilities in a manner that is unrelated to their commitment to exploring least cost alternatives for meeting power requirements. Allowing inclusion of CWIP costs in wholesale billing may actually encourage the utility industry to further delay examining least-cost alternatives and thus will not help the industry or the public in the long term. Indeed, it could sink the industry deeper into the same pattern of poor investments that helped get it into its present condition.

In this light, it is my opinion that allowing CWIP expenses to be included in wholesale rate bases would encourage a misallocation of a considerable amount of scarce financial resources. By assuring investor-owned utilities a captive source of funds that they can tap almost at will, the proposed CWIP regulation is a first step toward allowing the industry to bypass the public debt and equity markets and to avoid the risks inherent in their capital spending decisions. This, of course, would draw funds away from the development of other possible energy sources, conservation included, that must compete for capital in the marketplace.

At the minimum, the decision on whether to provide CWIP treatment should be based on a determination of the least-cost approach, as well as findings on the need for power and the short- and long-term consumer impacts. Making any decision solely or even primarily on a utility's financial rating, as the Commission's proposal suggests, could serve to reward some utilities whose poor financial status is due to mismanagement or faulty planning while penalizing the utilities whose past performance has afforded them sound ratings.

In conclusion, I feel the Commission's proposal to allow CWIP costs to be passed along in wholesale rate bases is premature and poorly presented. It shows no awareness of the cost-effectiveness of alternatives to the construction of additional centralized electric power generation facilities. It attempts to create an artificial economic environment, encouraging the utility industry to build more baseload plant, while ignoring the fact that demand growth has fallen off drastically. Such an approach is a piecemeal one and overlooks the fact that power generated at central stations now faces increasing competition from efficiency improvements, cogeneration and renewable resources.

This proposal will have far-reaching effects on all the customers of the utility industry, and warrants further consideration before it is implemented. Therefore, I recommend that the Commission refrain from further action on this proposal until such time as the concerns expressed above have been adequately addressed.

I request that this letter and the attached letters from Harold Schiebout and Barton Rule be made a part of the official record of FERC's activities on this proposed regulation.

Sincerely,

BERKLEY BEDELL.

IOWA ASSOCIATION OF MUNICIPAL UTILITIES,
Des Moines, Iowa, October 27, 1981.

Hon. BERKLEY BEDELL,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BEDELL: On behalf of the 141 Municipally owned Electric Systems in Iowa I wish to voice my concern about the Federal Energy Regulatory Commissions (FERC) proposed Construction work in progress (CWIP) regulations.

Those municipally owned electric utilities in Iowa who purchase wholesale power from other than public sources serve approximately 300,000 people. Allowing the inclusion of CWIP in a wholesale rate would increase the purchase price our member utilities pay. In turn that increase would be reflected in the retail rates of over 10% of the population of Iowa.

Any action you can take to prevent an increase in wholesale costs will mean a direct savings to our retail customers. On behalf of our members, and 300,000 Iowans we urge you to investigate this matter.

Sincerely,

BARTON D. RULE,
Executive Director.

CITY OF SIOUX CENTER, IOWA,
October 16, 1981.

Hon. BERKLEY BEDELL,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BEDELL: As Legislative Chairman of the Iowa Association of Municipal Utilities, I want to convey our concern about the impact of the proposed construction work in progress (CWIP) regulations by FERC.

There are approximately 85 municipally owned electric utility communities in Iowa who purchase wholesale power supply from nonpublic power sources, and therefore, would be impacted by the proposed CWIP regulations. Most of the communities are small, under 3,000 population. Our chief concern is on behalf of the consumers and small businesses who ultimately pay the bill.

More specifically, the enclosed fact sheet points out some of our main concerns with the proposed regulation.

As Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Energy Environment and Safety issues affecting small businesses, I believe you may want to investigate the specific impact that this proposed rule would have on the ability of small businesses to pay higher utility bills. It is my understanding that FERC has determined under the Regulatory Flexibility Act that the impact would be minimal. Again, I do not believe the FERC to be correct in its determination, and I urge you to investigate this issue.

Thank you for your interest and concern in this matter.

Respectfully yours,

HAROLD SCHIEBOUT,
IAMU Legislative Chairman.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished author of H.R. 555, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN).

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I, of course, rise in strong support of the bill since I was, as the gentleman from New York stated, the original author of it. I especially want to associate myself with the remarks made by the distinguished chairman of the full committee, Mr. DINGELL. I believe he really put his finger on it and, as they say, hit the nail on the head.

I also want to compliment the gentleman from New York, my colleague, DICK OTTINGER, with whom I have had the privilege of serving on the Committee on Science and Technology, for his many years of work on behalf of the consumers of America, especially in the areas of energy, energy production, and energy conservation.

I just want to repeat a little bit, I think for emphasis, what my colleague from Iowa, Mr. BEDELL, said and what Mr. DINGELL said earlier.

This bill is being touted by the opponents as some kind of a gross departure from what we have ever done in the past.

Quite frankly, what FERC did last year is the gross departure from the past. What we are doing, simply, with this bill is sort of returning to what we have been doing in this country since the last century; that is abiding by the "used and useful" rule.

Once a powerplant is finished, once it is providing power, then it can build the financing costs into the rate base.

So we are returning basically to what made America great and what really built our industry in this country in the past. This is a bill, as Mr. DINGELL said, that is an eminently fair bill.

Again, to listen to the opponents of it you would think that we are banning all CWIP. That is not so.

All we are saying in H.R. 555 is if a utility wants CWIP to be built into its construction costs, then it has to make certain showings to FERC. It has to show, for example, that it really needs it, that it cannot go to the bond or equity market and raise the money. There may be cases, when that is true.

It also has to show that this is indeed the least cost way of providing the energy to its consumers.

Now who could possibly argue with that? That is all they have to show. If they can show that, then FERC can grant them CWIP and they can build it right into their rate base immediately upon the start of construction.

That is why I say it is fair. It also does one other very important thing and I think this really is something that we have not talked about, but this bill provides CWIP as an extraordinary remedy, as some States now do.

Now I know, as one of the gentlemen said here earlier, that his State provides CWIP. It does, but not routinely, no, sir. You have to provide certain showings to that State regulatory agency before they are going to provide CWIP.

That is all we are asking that we do with FERC, also.

By treating it as an extraordinary remedy, I believe this would then continue the requirement that the utilities go to the bond and equity markets to obtain financing for new powerplants.

Why is that important? It is important because this helps insure that the utility management's decisions are prudent. This requirement that they have to go to the bond and equity markets first is a very significant check to assure that valuable capital is not wasted.

When CWIP is allowed arbitrarily as is being done now under the FERC rule of last year, which departed from almost a century of what we have been doing in this country, when it is allowed arbitrarily there is no check, there is no check and the ratepayers have to foot the bill regardless of the soundness of the utilities' decision.

As I said, there are times when an extraordinary remedy may be necessary. The utility might not be able to get the funds, for one reason or another, and this bill allows them to get CWIP from FERC in those cases and only in those cases.

That is why I agree with Mr. DINGELL that this is a fair bill. It is fair to the utilities and it is fair to the consumers of America.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge a "no" vote on this bill. H.R. 555 would irresponsibly repeal a rule carefully crafted by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. The Commissioners unanimously determined that this rule was necessary to insure economic and reliable electric utility service.

The FERC rule allows a utility to file for cash recovery of carrying or financing charges only on 50 percent of a utility's construction work in progress (CWIP). None of the principal investment in new facilities may be recovered until after the new plant is placed in service. Furthermore, FERC placed a consumer protective "cap" of 6 percent per year on any rate increase attributable to this rule. The FERC rule affects only 10 percent of all sales of electricity by privately owned electric companies in the United States.

This FERC rule was a limited, yet important, regulatory reform that was instituted only after 2 years of extensive hearings. A total of over 200 interested parties—including utilities, wholesale purchasers, and consumer groups—participated in these hearings. The utilities insisted that 100 percent of recovery of CWIP in the rate base was essential, while others wanted no CWIP in the rate base.

FERC promulgated a compromise rule which limited inclusion of CWIP financing charges in the rate base to one-half of such charges incurred by the utility. This rule is a sound and fair compromise that enables a utility to recover at least part of the financing charges while a plant is being built.

The FERC rule was designed to promote several benefits. Sooner or later, whether under H.R. 555 or the FERC rule, ratepayers will pay all of the financing charges, as well as the principal, for utility construction projects. The FERC rule, however, insures that ratepayers will ultimately pay less by eliminating the need to capitalize all of the financing charges. Under H.R. 555, the utilities would have to borrow additional amounts of money merely to pay the interest on the funds they borrowed for construction. In contrast, the FERC rule permits the utility to place 50 percent of the financing charges into the rate base. This reduces the amount of funds the utility must borrow and subsequently finance.

The FERC rule also minimizes "rate shock." Under the FERC rule, utility customers gradually adjust to the cost of new plants as 50 percent of financing costs are placed immediately into the rate base. This practice will assist in establishing rates that more accurately reflect the cost of new generating capacity. This could encourage conservation and alert utilities more readily that additional plant investment is unnecessary.

The FERC rule also reduces the regulatory bias discouraging the construction of new generating facilities. A major study on our Nation's need for new electrical generating capacity was released by DOE last summer. This report identified the rate treatment of CWIP as one of the significant financial disincentives causing concern about the electric power industry's willingness and ability to invest in the generating capacity necessary to meet our Nation's future energy needs.

Mr. Chairman, proponents of H.R. 555 apparently feel that they are somehow going to help the ratepayer by making it more costly for a utility to build a powerplant. This is obviously not the case. If enacted, H.R. 555 would harm our Nation's ratepayers in the following ways:

First. H.R. 555 would establish a new set of procedural hurdles which would make it impossible for most utilities to include financial costs for CWIP in the rate base.

Second. H.R. 555 would result in higher utility rates over the life of a powerplant;

Third. H.R. 555 would result in rate shock as the imposition of the full cost of powerplants on ratepayers will be postponed until the plant commences operation;

Fourth. H.R. 555 would discourage utilities from undertaking investments in more efficient and economical plants;

Fifth. H.R. 555 would pose a serious threat to the availability of adequate electricity service for this Nation's continued economic growth and prosperity;

Sixth. H.R. 555's disincentives to utility investment will prevent investment in alternatives to oil- and gas-fired facilities, thereby perpetuating America's dependence on foreign imports; and

Seventh. H.R. 555 will undo a necessary and carefully considered regulatory reform action by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and replace it with a complex, cumbersome, and palpably unworkable regulatory nightmare.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 555 would frustrate the fulfillment of FERC's regulatory responsibility. The proponents of H.R. 555 would have Congress substitute its judgment for FERC's expertise and over 2 years of comprehensive study based on 1 day of consideration by the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee. We cannot afford to ignore the warnings of Federal energy experts. I urge you not to inflict this law on our Nation and its ratepayers. Vote "no" on H.R. 555.

Thank you.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SLATTERY).

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Chairman, as a cosponsor of the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act, I am pleased to have this opportunity to reaffirm my support for this legislation. This bill will protect consumers from unwarranted and unfair rate increases, and it will promote sound energy investments.

The CWIP method of setting rates shifts much of the risk of investment from shareholders to consumers, and the risk consumers would be asked to bear is substantial. When utilities are permitted to include construction work in progress in their rates, consumers are subject to immediate and sometimes substantial rate increases. For example, a Kansas utility recently filed for a rate increase under CWIP that amounts to over $1,800,000 for the first year of the request. Many consumers, such as the elderly and the more mobile members of our society, could never benefit from their investment.

No other industry in the country receives a return on its investment prior to providing goods or services for which an investment is made. Utility customers could pump hundreds of millions of dollars into a powerplant that is never completed. Shifting the risk to consumers also removes utility decisionmakers from the discipline of the marketplace, thus encouraging them to make potentially unwise investments in powerplants while ignoring less costly methods of meeting energy demand. The utility industry will stay healthy only through innovation and cost-efficient management strategies.

This bill will require utilities to show that there is a genuine need to bill for CWIP. This will insure that when CWIP is used it will be in the consumer's best interest. This bill mandates FERC to review the facts of each case before allowing prebilling for CWIP. Doing so will return us to the regulatory policy, which had existed in this country since the last century of requiring that customers not be billed for construction costs until the plant is in operation unless the utility can show need.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Utah (Mr. NIELSON).

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I am in the embarrassing position of speaking against a bill of which I am a cosponsor.

At the time this bill was brought forward I felt there were a lot of good ideas in it and I agreed to cosponsor it.

In the interim I have attempted to take my name off unsuccessfully, so I am still listed as a cosponsor.

Let me indicate the reasons for my change of view on this particular bill.

First, H.R. 555 could create burdensome requirements that in the future could discourage investment in efficient and economical powerplants.

It could limit the CWIP and by doing so could create additional problems for those utilities in serious financial difficulty.

The current FERC ruling allows flexibility in dealing with utilities and currently FERC has ample authority to insure that the use of CWIP does not result in unfair competition between utilities. As a matter of fact, over a dozen cases have been done on this ruling and with no evidence whatever that such practice occurred.

The current FERC ruling was designed to assist the consumers because it reduced the cost of powerplants over the long run and also reduced the risk and utilities are better able to sell construction bonds in this case.

You also avoid rate shock. Rather having it go up gradually over the life of the building instead of having the shock when it is all finished.

CWIP only affects about 10 percent of the power sales. And FERC can react far faster now to help utilities then could Congress if they pass this burdensome rule, H.R. 555.

I am against regulation and this bill does place additional regulations on the industry and takes away the flexibility that FERC should have. While there are some good ideas that FERC could well incorporate in future rulings, and I also recommend they do that. I oppose this bill as written.

Let me read just a couple of comments from a letter from Donald Paul Hodel, Secretary of Energy:

The Department of Energy opposes H.R. 555. The exclusion of Construction-Work-in-Progress from the rate base can lead to distorted investment decisions by raising the cost of capital-intensive resources. By accumulating the interest costs during construction of new generating facilities, consumers end up paying interest on interest and getting hit wth "rate shock" when new capital-intensive facilities are put into service. Because of the difficulty in financing the higher capital cost, H.R. 555 would provide a disincentive to employ technologies with lower operating costs, such as hydro, solar, wind, and nuclear power. They will rely instead on low capital cost but fuel-intensive technologies, such as those that burn oil and gas. By discouraging those technologies which offer a cost-effective alternative to oil and gas as a generating fuel, H.R. 555 would reduce the balance and diversity in our nation's electric power system. The unfortunate legacy of such legislation would be higher electricity prices and a less reliable electric power system.

Electricity is a fundamental requirement for long term economic growth. We can not afford legislation which unnecessarily preempts the considered decisions of our regulatory institutions and casts a shadow over the adequacy and efficiency of our nation's electricity supplies. For this reason I urge you to vote against H.R. 555 and to allow the recent FERC rulemaking to stand.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, let us be clear what this bill does. This bill is a repeal of regulatory reform. All of those out in the country who believe that there has been damage done to the national economic growth as a result of too much regulation at the Federal level have got to oppose this bill. This bill is an attempt to reregulate the electrical industry.

Now, the Members have heard today from the same Members who are opposed to all kinds of regulatory reform. The same Members coming to the floor to support this bill were the Members who were here several months ago railing against the President's decision to deregulate the petroleum industry. And at that point they were out here saying that all kinds of terrible things would happen, that we would have $2 a gallon heating oil, that we would soon have $2 a gallon gasoline.

The fact is as soon as we deregulated the petroleum industry the prices went not up, but went down. And they have continued to drop. And we have seen a stabilization of the price in that industry.

Now, these are the Members who are now coming to you and promising you that what they will do is bring down prices for electricity.

I would simply say that the Secretary of Energy makes it quite clear that their approach is absolutely wrong. He said in a letter to the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL), dated February 6:

The unfortunate legacy of such legislation—

Meaning this legislation—would lead to higher electricity prices and less reliable electric power system.

Is that what we would want to do? That is a short-term political benefit that these Members are trying to take credit for at the cost of long term economic headaches in this country.

This is special interest, greedy special interest legislation being brought to the floor under the guise of consumer legislation that will cause the consumers of this country long term damage, will cause the economic growth potential of this country long term damage, and will cause the American people long-term headaches.

I think that this legislation ought to be rejected out of hand. I am surprised that anybody even has the guts to bring it to the floor.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DURBIN).

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, in the central and western Illinois counties that make up the 20th District, the people are faced with a hard winter and tremendously escalating utility costs. Every day my mail is filled with letters from people seeking some relief from this upward spiral that long ago raised many of their monthly utility bills above their rent or mortgage payments.

I rise today in support of H.R. 555 which promises some relief. It offers a means of attacking this spiral by cracking down on the use of the construction works in progress formula as a means of increasing utility rates.

This bill would prohibit FERC from allowing utilities to use the CWIP formula unless the utilities can demonstrate that they have insufficient cash flow and that the new facility represents the least costly way to meet electricity demands.

Consumers are given protection from unwarranted and unfair rate increases by this bill. It places stringent conditions on the questionable practice of forcing consumers to pay for financing costs on plants they may never use. It takes away the incentive for utilities to risk costly investment in inefficient or unwise ventures since the consumer will not have to pay for financing needed to cover cost overruns and construction delays every time he or she turns on the light switch.

No one would dispute the point that consumers should pay for the power that is provided to them. However, they should not pay for the financing of construction of a powerplant while that work is still underway. Recent events around the Nation have proven that just because a powerplant has been started and nearly completed is no guarantee it will go on line.

Another important provision of this bill, one particularly beneficial to the 20th District with its rich coal deposits in an energy-hungry nation, is the exception for coal-fired powerplants.

Under this bill, any utility converting from other energy to coal gets 100 percent CWIP for financing costs during construction. This is an effort to encourage conversion to coal-fired plants. Coal is abundant, it is efficient and it lessens our dependence on foreign oil or more expensive electrical generating technologies.

Elimination of the CWIP for inefficient projects should serve as a corrective to unwise policies that have left consumers holding the bag for utility management mistakes.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. MOODY).

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the legislation.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. LOWRY).

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555 and commend the work of its sponsor, the gentleman from Iowa, and the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Energy and Power, for their leadership in bringing this legislation to the floor today.

In January 1982, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) proposed a change in its rules to allow electric utilities to include construction work in progress (CWIP) in the determination of their rates to wholesale customers. I was greatly concerned about the adverse effects on consumers' electric rates that such a change in Federal power policy would produce. I was also wary that automatic CWIP would spark a new wave of unnecessary and expensive power projects in this country as the risk of major construction shifted to the ratepayers. I wrote to FERC expressing my concerns at that time, and joined with Congressman HARKIN and others in sponsoring legislation restricting CWIP except for pollution devices or when, on a case by case basis, utilities could demonstrate severe financial difficulty in the absence of CWIP. I am very disappointed that FERC's final CWIP rule, issued in July 1983, permits any utility to include all CWIP for pollution control and fuel conversion facilities and 50 percent of all other CWIP in the rate base.

Those of us who live in the Pacific Northwest have a special sensitivity to the effects of allowing interest during construction or CWIP to utilities undertaking major power projects. Our experience with CWIP financing of the Washington Public Power Supply System's (WPPSS) nuclear projects provides a clear warning against such a policy. Interest costs on the WPPSS plants, even before plants 4 and 5 were terminated, resulted in skyrocketing increases in the cost of electricity. The inclusion of CWIP in WPPSS rate determinations placed the Pacific Northwest consumer in a position of bearing substantial risks without any of the benefits normally derived from investment, and at costs that were quickly out of control. Today, those consumers are faced with the possibility of as many as four WPPSS dry holes. Today, not one megawatt of electricity has been generated by the WPPSS nuclear plants.

I am told that the FERC ruling will have little or no direct impact on the cost of power in the State of Washington—BPA's wholesale power sales are not regulated by FERC in this regard. As a matter of national policy, however, I believe that the allowance of automatic CWIP in wholesale electric rates is extremely misguided. Utilities will be encouraged to build where building may not be necessary and consumers will have to spend increasingly higher proportions of their incomes to pay utility bills. It is also important to emphasize that, although FERC's rule only applies to about 10 percent of firm power sales of electricity in the United States, it establishes a precedent that State utility commissions are likely to follow. It is most important that we change the nature of the regulatory climate in Washington now so that automatic CWIP does not become generalized utility practice.

In fact, since the FERC rule became effective, private utilities have filed for more than $100 million in CWIP-related rate increases. This represents a substantial, and potentially unwarranted, burden on the ratepayers. For senior citizens, who may never receive any benefits of the plants, the CWIP-induced rate hikes are especially unfair. Something has to be done to respond to the new FERC policy.

H.R. 555 provides that response. It doe not reverse the FERC decision. Rather, it provides a new approach to the CWIP issue. H.R. 555 would require FERC to scrutinize CWIP requests on a case by case basis, limiting it in the rate base to situations in which a utility shows that it has poor cash flow, that it must borrow money at rates significantly above the industry average, and that the proposed facility is necessary and the least expensive when alternatives such as energy efficiency, load management, renewables, cogeneration and changes in rate structure have been considered. In effect, the bill balances utilities' need for capital with the consumers' need for protection against excessive rate increases.

Opponents of this legislation argue that it threatens the financial stability of electric utilities and would produce major power shortages. I have not seen evidence to support these claims. H.R. 555 simply provides safeguards to insure sound utility practices. The financial health of the electric utility industry has been steadily improving and now provides some of the best rates of return available. In this environment, FERC's policy permitting automatic CWIP is clearly unjustified. It could distort energy markets, and distract utilities from sound management decisions. We are also in no danger of running short of electric capacity. According to a report by the Congessional Research Service, there will be ample electrical generating capacity to serve the Nation's needs through 1990, and probably through the year 2000. Should this projection prove faulty, there will still be ample time to obtain new capacity through conservation, renewable and alternative energy supplies. H.R. 555 simply insures that involuntary consumer financing does not encourage imprudent projects when cheaper, and often more environmentally sound, alternatives are available.

H.R. 555 is a fair and responsible bill. I strongly urge my colleagues to vote for its passage and against any weakening amendments.

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983. Under current law utilities are allowed to automatically charge customers for the cost of constructing powerplants before those customers ever enjoy the benefits of power. This has an adverse impact on consumers and increases the likelihood of the construction of unnecessary power plants.

CWIP forces consumers to pay millions of dollars in higher electric rates while many utilities are in no need of rate relief. According to the American Public Power Association, the FERC rule allowing CWIP will cause an immediate rate hike totaling $750 million over the next 2 to 3 years. Additionally, consumers are denied the use of their own money.

When CWIP is allowed, consumers are unprotected from utility managers who are no longer disciplined by the financial marketplace. New power plants cost billions of dollars. With CWIP, utilities have less incentive to evaluate conservation, load management, or alternative energy resources when they are effectively guaranteed a return on investment.

When consumers pay for CWIP, there is chance that they will never benefit from power for which they are paying. Over the past 10 years, over 100 electric plants were canceled after more that $10 billion had been spent on them. If comsumers had paid CWIP, they would have contributed funds for plants which will never generate electricity. In California, construction of the Diablo Canyon Nuclear Power Plant began 17 years ago. Licensing of the plant has been delayed as a result of the discovery of an earthquake fault 3 miles offshore from the plant and the realization that the blueprints had been reversed. Recently, new charges have surfaced alleging that the plant was built in massive violation of Federal safety regulations. The price of the plant has increased from $300 million in 1966 to a current estimate of $4.2 billion. Should Pacific Gas & Electric Co. customers have been forced to pay for these incredible costs—many of which were incurred as a result of mistakes—when they may never benefit from power generated at the plant?

CWIP also has an adverse impact on senior citizens and more mobile members of our society, who are charged for facility costs, when they will never receive power from them.

Wholesale customers, which are utilities themselves, lose some capital which could be invested in their own generating plants. They are forced to pay double costs. They must pay their own construction costs, while they pay the construction costs of their supplier. When FERC allows CWIP in the wholesale rate base, but the State does not allow it, the wholesale customers are caught in a price squeeze. These customers' wholesale rates—and, hence their retail rates—are increased to reflect CWIP, while retail rates of competing private utilities are not raised to include CWIP.

I cite the example of my home State of California where the prevention of the use of CWIP in the rate base has been beneficial. The California Public Utilities Commission has never had a policy of permitting CWIP. This policy was in effect during the 1970's when California utilities were in poor financial condition. During that time, California utilities planned to build several major power plants. Because they did not have CWIP in the rate base, they did not build most of those plants. Since the 1970's, there has been a reduction in demand and the need for those plants has diminished. In testimony before the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee, Barbara Barkovich, director, Policy and Planning Division of the California Public Utilities Commission, stated that the California utilities financial position has improved for two reasons:

> One is that they have cut back on what turned out to be unnecessary projects, and two, . . . because we have devised some ratemaking methodologies for providing more financial stability for the utility industry without the use of CWIP.

These utilities invested in renewable energy and those investments contributed to the decline in demand for conventional resources. According to Ms. Barkovich, in at least one case, the San Diego Gas & Electric Sun Desert project, the presence of CWIP in the rate base would have been an added inducement for the utility company to invests in the project. San Diego Gas & Electric ultimately terminated the project, in part because the commission determined that the company was financially incapable of sustaining the investment. Recent events have proven that this was a sensible decision. The utility company has been able to both develop its own resources and buy power from out of State at a much cheaper price, while its financial position has strengthened immeasurably as a result of not undertaking that uneconomical and unnecessary financial burden.

H.R. 555 would allow CWIP in some limited circumstances where the public interest is served and the utility can demonstrate a clear financial need. For example, CWIP would be allowed for installation of pollution control facilities, plant conversions from oil or natural gas to other fuels and for private utilities which demonstrate a financial need. CWIP determinations should be made on a case by case basis.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 555, a sound and sensible piece of legislation.●

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, today we have the opportunity to overturn a misguided decision by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to allow electric utilities to earn profit from generating facilities which do not yet deliver a watt of power. In the past, FERC permitted utilities to apply for construction works in progress to install pollution control facilities, to convert oil- or gas-fired plants to other fuels or to expand electric capacity in cases of severe financial difficulty. This policy allowed such financially strapped utilities to add to their rate bases the cost of new generating or transmission facilities. In 1983, however, FERC ruled that any utility regardless of financial condition could include half of its CWIP costs in its rate base for wholesale customers.

CWIP is bad energy policy. By allowing electric utilities to include in their rate bases the costs of new generating or transmitting facilities under construction, investments in conservation, load management and alternative energy resources are discouraged.

CWIP also could result in excess electric capacity. The Library of Congress has estimated that we will have ample electricity generating capacity to meet our needs through 1990, and sufficient capacity through year 2000. By restricting CWIP to utilities which demonstrate inability to obtain capital at reasonable rates, we will discourage construction of costly excess capacity.

CWIP is bad consumer policy. Consumers are presently being forced to pay higher electric rates for facilities from which they receive no benefit. Since the FERC ruling, utilities have filed for rate increases from $450,000 to $50 million. These consumers may never benefit from this new construction—the Energy Information Administration estimates that $10 billion was spent on constructing plants which were later terminated and never completed. This represents $10 billion which could have been invested in conservation and alternative energy sources or saved by consumers, in the form of lower electric rates.

H.R. 555 is sound consumer and energy policy. This legislation would permit a utility to apply for inclusion of CWIP in FERC rates when the utility shows it needs ratepayer financing to start or complete needed capacity. H.R. 555 permits a utility to apply for CWIP if its construction program is designed to provide least cost energy, if the company is unable to borrow at reasonable rates and if the addition of CWIP to its rate base would not place wholesale customers at a competitive disadvantage. This legislation would assure that consumers would pay CWIP only when extraordinary rate relief is justified.

H.R. 555 has been endorsed by groups representing consumers, environmentalists, and public power, including the American Public Power Association, the Citizen-Labor Energy Coalition, the environmental defense fund, Friends of the Earth, the National Association of State Utility Consumer Advocates, the National Farmers Union, the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, the Sierra Club, the United Autoworkers, and the United Steelworkers of America.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work In Progress Policy Act of 1983. This legislation offers the American consumer a defense against rising utility costs, and a better regulating mechanism that will help to promote energy conservation.

Publicly owned utilities have traditionally not been allowed to pass along their current CWIP costs to the consumer. This approach has been taken so that construction costs are billed when utility improvements are actually felt by the consumer. This system is fair because the same consumers who would benefit from construction would be paying for it.

As a result of an unfortunate rule change made last year by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, federally regulated utilities will be allowed to include up to 50 percent of CWIP costs in their current rate base, which translates into an up-front charge to the consumer for a project not yet generating power. This rule would allow a company to choose to build a new powerplant, spend billions of dollars, and be assured of up-front financing and an all-but-guaranteed return on equity. The result of this procedure would penalize consumers, who will have to forego money they earn today for a product they may or may not even use, perhaps a decade later.

The imposition of the new CWIP ruling has already caused a number of requests for CWIP-related increases. This comes at a time when many projects—some new and others just under consideration—have been questioned on the grounds of need or viability.

H.R. 555 is a positive measure that would benefit the consumer. This legislation would permit the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to allow the addition of CWIP costs to rate bases for only exceptional cases, including cases where a ultility has a sound construction project under consideration, but cannot meet its costs because of financial difficulties. Pollution control construction improvements will still be allowable as a CWIP cost, which we all know is an important conservation incentive.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of H.R. 555. The American consumer has everything to gain from this legislation. By offering CWIP as the exception and not the rule, we will correct what is clearly a simple inequity in the eyes of the American consumer.●

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Chairman, I oppose H.R. 555, a bill to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the amount of costs that utilities are allowed to recover through the construction work in progress (CWIP) mechanism. I opposed this legislation in the Energy and Commerce Committee for the reasons stated in the minority views which I joined several of my colleagues in signing. These views are stated in the committee report accompanying the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983 (Rept. No. 98-350).

Basically, despite all the rhetoric to the contrary, H.R. 555 would increase consumer costs of electricity in the long run and would contribute to large and sudden rate increases when new powerplants are placed in service. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has extensively considered this issue and has unanimously put into effect a rule which is well-reasoned and equitable. H.R. 555 would reverse that rule.

Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of our colleagues, I would like to include in the RECORD the text of two February 6 letters on this subject. Both letters oppose H.R. 555. The first is from FERC Chairman Raymond J. O'Connor to Congressman CARLOS J. MOORHEAD, the ranking minority member of the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee. The second, is from DOE Secretary Hodel; I understand this letter was sent to all Members.

The letters follow:

FEDERAL ENERGY
REGULATORY COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., February 6, 1984.

Hon. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD,
Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power, Committee on Energy and Commerce, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MOORHEAD: This is in response to your letter of February 2, 1984, requesting my views on H.R. 555, a bill designed to amend the Federal Power Act to prescribe a new ratemaking treatment for financing expenses incurred in relation to construction work in progress (CWIP). As I understand it, the objective of this legislation is to reverse the Commission's Order No. 298, which many Members apparently find inimical to the interests of ratepayers. Having reviewed the draft legislation and the Commission's present rules, I feel I must disagree with the economic assumptions underlying the bill and the view that the Commission's action somehow contravenes the public interest.

The final rule in Order No. 298 represents years of experience dealing with the cost of financing a utility plant as it impacts wholesale electric rates. I believe it is a judicious reform of the anomalous practice of excluding from rate base the cost of financing ongoing construction programs. Not only did the "financial distress" test for CWIP, which was abandoned by the Commission, afford the industry little assistance in a time of economic hardship and stop-gap regulatory policies, it did not enable utilities to prepare to meet the demands of the future.

H.R. 555 would basically reinstate the prior CWIP policy. As the Commission recognized in its revised CWIP rule, however, both utility companies and ratepayers can be hurt by the prolonged accrual of noncash earnings on utility books. For the utility, the practice meant high financing costs, lower interest coverage ratios, severely diminished cash flow, and incentives to pursue short-term strategies that may defeat the goals of long-term planning, notably that of providing power to ratepayers at the lowest reasonable cost. More importantly for ratepayers, the earlier practice meant demands for power that did not relate to the current actual cost of that power and sudden increases in rates each time the costs of a newly operational facility, including accrued financing costs, were added to rate base. In sum, the enforced delay in recovering financing costs is difficult to justify for any utility and is indefensible for those undergoing financial stress. Yet, H.R. 555 would essentially reinstate that practice and place substantial impediments in the way of more expeditious cost recovery.

The current utility picture also disfavors the H.R. 555 approach. Large construction programs will eventually mean precipitous rate increases as facilities become operable. Many public utilities have construction programs which are significant in terms of the net worth of each such company. Such large construction programs have enormous implications for rates. Without a viable CWIP policy, the long-term cost of reliable power will escalate.

To date, twelve rate cases involving CWIP have been filed under the new rule. As these and future cases are addressed by the Commission, the Congress and the public will be able to ascertain more clearly whether the Commission's approach is equitable and economically viable. The Congress may wish to benefit from the Commission's experience under the new rule before requiring so radical a reversal of Commission ratemaking policy.

The question at hand is whether the regulatory policy under which the utility industry meets the future will assist rational economic planning or lead to piecemeal short-term strategies. I believe the Commission's rule offers long-term benefits to the public that the Congress should not cast aside, particularly in favor of the administratively cumbersome and economically unpredictable scheme of H.R. 555.

If I can supply further information on this important matter, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND J. O'CONNOR,
Chairman.

THE SECRETARY OF ENERGY,
Washington, D.C., February 6, 1984.

Hon. TOM CORCORAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CORCORAN: The Committee on Energy and Commerce has approved for full House consideration a bill (H.R. 555) to regulate the inclusion of the costs of Construction-Work-in-Progress (CWIP) in electric utility rate bases under the jurisdiction of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC). The proposed legislation would reverse a recent unanimous FERC rulemaking, made after extensive consideration and public comment, that allows up to 50 percent of a utility company's construction expenditures to be included in its rate base as these expenses are incurred, subject to strict conditions.

The Department of Energy opposes H.R. 555. The exclusion of Construction-Work-in-Progress from the rate base can lead to distorted investment decisions by raising the cost of capital-intensive resources. By accumulating the interest costs during construction of new generating facilities, consumers end up paying interest on interest and getting hit with "rate shock" when new capital-intensive facilities are put into service. Because of the difficulty in financing the higher capital cost, H.R. 555 would provide a disincentive to employ technologies with lower operating costs, such as hydro, solar, wind, and nuclear power. They will rely instead on low capital cost but fuel-intensive technologies, such as those that burn oil and gas. By discouraging those technologies which offer a cost-effective alternative to oil and gas as a generating fuel, H.R. 555 would reduce the balance and diversity in our nation's electric power system. The unfortunate legacy of such legislation would be higher electricity prices and a less reliable electric power system.

We support the recent FERC rulemaking on Construction-Work-in-Progress. It is a responsible and well-reasoned step which recognizes the difficulties utility companies face today financing the electric power investments which will sustain our economy in the future. The FERC rulemaking is supportive of the national energy policy goal of assuring an adequate and diverse energy supply at a reasonable cost, as expressed in the recent National Energy Policy Plan.

Electricity is a fundamental requirement for long term economic growth. We can not afford legislation which unnecessarily preempts the considered decisions of our regulatory institutions and casts a shadow over the adequacy and efficiency of our nation's electricity supplies. For this reason I urge you to vote against H.R. 555 and to allow the recent FERC rulemaking to stand.

Sincerely,

DONALD PAUL HODEL.●

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 555, a bill to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work through rate increases.

We are all concerned, I know, with the rising cost to utility customers that have occurred with alarming frequency in the past few years. Since utility companies are, by the very nature, federally empowered monopolies, it is incumbent upon us to make sure that what we do on the Federal level asssures the absolutely lowest cost to the consumer consistent with adequate future electrical supplies.

The concept of allowing publically owned electric utilities to use the costs of construction work in progress is not a new one. In 1976, the Federal Power Commission allowed utilities that demonstrated that they were in severe financial distress to include the costs of financing new plants in their wholesale rate base while these plants were still under construction. That was the situation until this past year when the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission considerably liberalized this regulation by allowing any utility, regardless of financial condition, to include half the costs of financing a power plant in its wholesale rate while the plant was still under construction.

To my mind, this was a badly made decision. While no one would deny that specific electric utilities which are experiencing severe cash flow problems should have the opportunity to somewhat alleviate that pressure through the mechanisms of a construction work in progress allocation in their wholesale rates, to broaden out that franchise to any and all utilities, regardless of their financial condition, is, in my view, a total abrogation of our responsibility to protect the electric customer from unwarranted rate increases.

The provisions of H.R. 555 would prohibit the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission from allowing utilities to include in their wholesale rates the cost of financing new powerplants still under construction unless the utility can demonstrate that it has insufficient cash flow and that the new facility represents the least costly method of meeting electricity demand. The bill does not, as some of its opponents would lead you to believe, totally foreclose these utilities from making such rate adjustments. It only puts into place a mechanism that calls on the utility to establish two things: First, that it is indeed in a serious cash flow problem; and second, that the new construction whose cost it wishes to pass on to its present customers is the most cost efficient method of providing needed electrical supplies.

If, in fact, the utility can demonstrate these two conditions, it will be allowed to make the rate adjustment. These two preconditions seem to me the least we can do to protect the electric customer from unwarranted price increase due to bad business decisions on the part of utility companies, and to make sure that we do, in fact, provide the of kind of oversight necessary to protect the consumer from increased costs directed to them from a federally protected monopoly, which does operate not under the law of supply and demand.

We have seen, in the past few years, examples in another utility, natural gas, the results of unexamined passthroughs of cost to the consumers, passthroughs which over the past 5 years have in many cases doubled the cost consumers pay. Let us take this opportunity today to make sure that the same thing does not happen to electric rates. A good starting point for that process would be in an overwhelming show of support for H.R. 555. I urge my colleagues to vote for this badly needed consumer protection legislation.●

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, as a sponsor of H.R. 555, and as a Californian, whose State utility regulators have seen the wisdom of denying construction work in progress charges, I am pleased to support this bill.

The very thoughtful committee report outlines both sides of the argument, but reaches the conclusion, and I quote:

> On the basis of the available evidence then, there is no question that inclusion of CWIP in rate base according to the (Federal Energy Regulatory) Commission rule will cause a rate increase, an increase that will equal 6% per annum for two straight years and, cumulatively, exceed 12 percent after three years for some customers. On the other hand, there is no evidence that this increase will result in rate decreases of any magnitude in the foreseeable future or even that rates will be lower than they otherwise would be.

The CWIP rule encourages utilities to undertake huge new, questionable projects by lowering the cost of capital to them and shifting much of the risk to the energy users rather than the utility stockholders. This is not the kind of incentive we should be providing: we should be encouraging conservation and the use of alternative energy sources. In fact, we are encouraging such alternatives through the Tax Code. Congress has provided generous investment tax credits to the wind, solar, and geothermal industries along with requirements that utilities buy whatever power these new energy groups provide. In some parts of the country, these new alternative energy companies are starting to bring power onstream at reasonable costs. To provide the big utlities with CWIP benefits runs counter to this other program and prolongs the day that these alternative energies will be asking Congress for "start-up" subsidies. It would be nice, Mr. Chairman, if we could coordinate our subsidies for a change, instead of making them counterproductive.

For all these reasons, I urge the passage of H.R. 555.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555, a bill to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress (CWIP) through rate increases. My colleague, Congressman TOM HARKIN, is to be commended for shaping this legislation which protects consumers from unwarranted and unfair rate increases and will promote sound energy investments.

The Federal Electric Regulatory Commission (FERC) in 1983 decided to allow utilities to include 50 percent of the finance charges for a new plant, while it is still under construction, in the rate base which determines electric rates. Under this new FERC rule, utilities are able to include CWIP without proving that the new plant is needed or that the utility is in financial trouble. This decision is unfortunate because it is increasing our constituents' present electric bills and heightens the risk of building unneeded plants.

Traditionally, consumers have not had to pay for a new electric plant until it began to produce electricity. Now consumers who may never use electricity from a new plant, such as the elderly and the mobile younger generation, will have to pay for it. It is also not even clear that paying for plants now will save consumers money in the future. This is especially true when you discount future consumer utility savings to take into account the return consumers would get on the money if it were not paid to the utilities in the present.

The CWIP method of setting rates shifts much of the risk of investment from shareholders to consumers. The risk consumers would be asked to bear is substantial: utility customers could pump hundreds of millions of dollars into a powerplant that is never completed. In addition, by partially removing building decisions from the scrutiny of the market, utilities may make potentially unwise decisions regarding new plants because they know that the consumer will have already picked up a good portion of the cost if anything goes wrong. Instead of encouraging conservation, indiscriminate use of CWIP encourages unwise construction at the expense of conservation.

There are times when it would be socially useful to include CWIP in the rate base and H.R. 555 reflects this fact. H.R. 555 allows inclusion of CWIP in the rate base for construction involving pollution control or plant conversion. In addition, the bill provides a process for inclusion of CWIP when a utility is in financial trouble and thus may have to pay too much for a loan to build a needed plant. The key difference between the bill and the FERC rule is that the bill mandates the Commission to review the facts of each case before allowing CWIP to be included. This will not create unnecessary regulatory burdens, but it will prevent utilities from embarking on another binge of expensive and often totally unnecessary construction.

Mr. Chairman, the FERC decision, in undercutting a longstanding policy that consumers should not have to pay for a powerplant until it starts generating electricity, is just another example of the Reagan administration's bias in favor of the private investor over and against the consumer. H.R. 555 overturns this unwise decision and will insure that when CWIP is included in the rate base, it will be in the consumer's best interest. The intent of the bill is not to discourage investment, but to discourage investment in unnecessary powerplants. Let us pass H.R. 555.●

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress (CWIP) Policy Act of 1983.

Last July, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) allowed electric utilities to place CWIP in their rate bases. Under this new rule, utilities are routinely permitted to charge ratepayers 50 percent of the financing charges on the costs of new powerplants while they are under construction. This FERC position reverses regulatory policy that goes back to the last century, insuring that customers not pay until a plant is producing electricity.

H.R. 555 would permit a utility to apply for the inclusion of CWIP in FERC rate bases only when the utility demonstrates a need for an infusion of ratepayer cash to initiate or complete needed new capacity. It would require FERC, as it did until this year, to treat CWIP as an extraordinary remedy on a case-by-case basis. I believe that this bill embodies a much improved CWIP policy.

Opponents of this bill claim that allowing CWIP in the rate base is in the consumers interest. This is just not true. While under certain economic assumption, a plant may cost less with CWIP than under traditional regulation, lower plant costs do not mean lower rates. Furthermore, consumers are compelled to pay millions of dollars immediately in higher electric rates. Thus, consumers are denied the current use of their money to meet subsistence needs, install conservation devices, or invest. Consumers' purchasing power will be greater if they retain their money and invest it at a rate at least equal to a utility's cost of capital. Also, wholesale customers, which are utilities themselves, lose some capital which could be invested in their own generating plants.

Consumers' pocketbooks are unprotected when the financial risk of cancellation or uneconomic investment is transferred from shareholder to ratepayer. This partially removes the utility management from the discipline of financial markets. Billions of dollars are at stake when a utility decides to construct a powerplant. Utilities have much less economic incentive to evaluate conservation, load management, or alternative energy resources when they are effectively guaranteed a return on investment from consumers in a new powerplant under construction.

Consumers also take a substantial risk that they will never benefit from their CWIP contribution. Over the last 10 years, well over 100 electric plants were canceled after more than $10 billion had been spent on them. If consumers had paid CWIP, they would have contributed funds for plants which will never generate electricity. And in an increasingly older and more mobile society, many people would be charged CWIP, but would never receive power from facilities completed many years later.

As I have explained, CWIP is usually a losing proposition for consumers. Consumers are already aware of the cost of electricity—rates have risen over 70 percent during the past 5 years and consumers have reduced their demand accordingly. Thus, at a time when electric bills are rising, and demand is declining, should consumers bear the immediate cost and risk of generating plants that are not supplying electricity and may never be needed? I firmly believe that the answer is "no."

I urge my colleagues to join with me in protecting the consumer, by voting for this important consumer legislation.●

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I support H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983. This bill, which provides limitations to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's power to allow electric utilities to prebill customers for construction costs, is one of the most important pieces of consumer legislation to come before the 98th Congress.

Construction work in progress permits electrical utilities to charge ratepayers for the costs incurred in building new generating or transmission facilities during the construction period. Already, 10 utilities have filed for CWIP-related increases totaling over $10 million. At a time when electric bills are continuing to rise, consumers should not have to bear the immediate cost and risk of powerplants from which they may see no benefits. In some cases, these plants will never even be completed. With construction work in progress, the consumer loses. Our elderly citizens may well be the biggest losers as their contributions are often used to finance plants which are not scheduled for completion for many years in the future.

So while H.R. 555 responds to the financial needs of private utilities, it also protects consumers from excessive and unjustified rate increases. H.R. 555 is truly fair legislation and I urge my colleagues to support it.●

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, rather than being such shocking and radical legislation, all this legislation does is return part of the way to the way wholesale power has been regulated over the years.

I do not understand what is so shocking about that. Under the ordinary course of things, utilities have always had to put up the risk capital to build their own plants. This bill allows them to shift that burden to consumers where they can show that there is a genuine financial need to do so.

So it is much more generous than what has occurred ordinarily.

The opponents of this legislation talk about rate shock. Well, I daresay that 80 percent of the plants in the country have been built without CWIP and there has been no rate shock.

It is just a shibboleth of an argument. They talk about careful study. How FERC got to 50 percent was to average between the utilities that wanted 100 percent and others who wanted nothing.

So I urge support of the legislation, as do many organizations. The following are samples of the correspondence received on this bill:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF SENIOR CITIZENS,
Washington, D.C., February 6, 1983.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: The National Council of Senior Citizens, representing over 4.5 million older Americans, endorses H.R. 555 and urges you to support it as well. Our overriding belief is that all energy policy decisions must take into account the impact they have on low-income people.

On few other issues do we receive as much mail as we do from people concerned about the high cost of home energy. Our members and millions of others live in fear that at winter's peak their source of heat might be suddenly cut off.

The Construction Work In Progress (CWIP) issue is of particular relevance and concern to NCSC and our members. Senior citizens will be asked to finance construction projects that may not be completed until long after they have passed away. Consumers have been financing energy projects through the rate base for too long and are now paying higher costs for energy due to over-building by many of our nation's utilities. We must not allow this to continue.

H.R. 555 would not preclude a utility from financing construction through the rate base. However, it would require each utility choosing to do so to prove financial need to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Given FERC's past performance in allowing oil and gas price increases, we feel sure that utilities need not worry about the Agency's willingness to grant the necessary waivers should they be justified.

For all of these reasons, we urge you to vote to support H.R. 555 when it comes to the House floor this week.

Sincerely,

ERIC SHULMAN,
Director of Legislative Liaison and Research.

AMERICAN PUBLIC POWER ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., February 1, 1984.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: Members of Congress have few opportunities to respond to their constituents' concerns over rising utility rates. Next week, such an opportunity may be presented if, as expected, the House of Representatives considers H.R. 555, the "Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983." H.R. 555 will help ensure that wholesale electric utility rates set by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) are indeed kept just and reasonable.

In 1983, FERC adopted a rule allowing investor owned utilities to include automatically in their rate base 50 percent of their construction work in progress (CWIP). Under this rule, companies could begin earning a return on facilities whether or not they are in operation—or in fact whether they will ever operate.

FERC has indicated that its allowance of 50 percent of CWIP automatically was a compromise between the position of private utilities who wanted 100 percent inclusion of CWIP and those who wanted to prohibit CWIP totally. The American Public Power Association (APPA), representing over 1,750 electric utilities nationwide, supports neither position. Instead, APPA believes that CWIP is an extraordinary form of rate relief which should be granted on a case-by-case basis of demonstrated utility financial need. H.R. 555 embodies that standard and ensures that FERC meets its regulatory responsibilities under the Federal Power Act.

The impact of the FERC rule is already being felt. Ten utilities have filed for CWIP-related increases totalling over $100 million. One utility, New England Power Company (NEPCO), has filed for nearly half that increase. Yet NEPCO's parent company, New England Electric System (NEES), is a financially healthy company. For the year ending June 30, 1983, NEES' earnings were up 19 percent and its return on common equity was 17.4 percent. It is inequitable for ratepayers to pay higher electric bills to NEPCO without some genuine need, but the FERC rule requires none.

In fact, many private utilities may not be able to demonstrate a financial need for CWIP today. While FERC may have originally intended for its rule to meet the alleged financial difficulties of the industry, that is no longer the case today. With the economic recovery, the performance of many companies has improved markedly. Although a few companies face potential financial problems because of difficulties with nuclear power plants, Business Week commented recently that "the outlook for the industry is far brighter than the stormy headlines imply."

The FERC rule is more than a financial windfall for private utilities. It is anticompetitive. Many publicly owned utilities are becoming energy self-sufficient through investments in their own generating capacity. But public systems should not be obligated to pay for future capacity twice—once, in the form of CWIP to their existing supplier and, second, when they pay for their own plant. FERC acknowledges this dilemma, but imposes such a stringent burden as to make it nearly impossible for such systems to prove their case.

Competition also is impaired where states treat CWIP in retail rates differently than FERC does with wholesale rates. Increasingly, states such as Pennsylvania, Missouri, Texas, California, Oregon and New Hampshire are prohibiting or severely restricting CWIP in retail rates. If a publicly owned utility located in one of these states must pass on a CWIP increase to its ratepayers, while its wholesale utility supplier cannot do the same to its retail ratepayers, the public system will be caught in a "price squeeze." FERC precedents, however, provide little recourse for a publicly owned utility placed in this situation.

H.R. 555 addresses each of these inequities. It provides that only utilities with a genuine financial need may qualify for CWIP relief. Where utilities can demonstrate such a need, and are constructing cost-effective facilities, H.R. 555 will provide them with the necessary financial relief. Equally important, H.R. 555 will protect competition within the electric utility industry. If publicly owned utilities show that they are constructing their own generating capacity, or may be caught in a "price squeeze," they will have adequate recourse to correct these problems. In short, H.R. 555 will promote the adoption of sound regulatory policies at FERC.

For the reasons set forth above, APPA again urges your support for H.R. 555 when it comes to the floor.

Sincerely,

ALEX RADIN,
Executive Director.

CONSUMER FEDERATION OF AMERICA,
February 3, 1984.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: On behalf of our more than 200 organizations and their over 30 million members, Consumer Federation of America strongly encourages you to support H.R. 555, which would limit the Federal Regulatory Commission's (FERC) power to allow electric utilities to pre-bill customers for construction costs. Absent H.R. 555, FERC's 1983 decision to permit utilities to automatically include construction costs in their current rate base would stand, having an adverse impact on consumers, on economic activity, and on the delicate balance between federal and state regulators.

First and foremost, prebilling for construction work in progress (CWIP) would be extremely costly to consumers—already 10 utilities have filed for CWIP-related increases totalling over $100 million. Moreover, it would be grossly unfair to charge ratepayers for the costs of producing electricity they may never use. In an increasingly older and more mobile society, and with the all-to-frequent cancellations of power plant construction, this inequity is more than hypothetical.

In addition, a less than stringent approach to CWIP would impose broader economic and political costs. Prebilling would transfer much of the risk involved in building a power plant from shareholders to ratepayers. Consequently, CWIP biases utilities toward plant expansion rather than to investments in energy-saving alternatives. In recent years, a number of far-sighted utilities have emphasized conservation more than new construction. Prebilling would penalize these companies, while rewarding those obsessed with expansion.

Finally, CWIP threatens to disrupt the balance between FERC and state public service commissions. The very existence of the FERC rule will provide substantial incentive for utility companies to restructure into separate generation and distribution subsidiaries. This accomplished, a utility would be selling power to itself at wholesale rates, sweeping the transaction out from under state jurisdiction and into the more permissive, CWIP-allowed arena of FERC's jurisdiction. This type of restructuring is already being attempted.

By limiting FERC approval of CWIP to instances of demonstrated economic necessity, H.R. 555 minimizes long-term costs to consumers without penalizing hard-pressed utilities. CFA urges you to support this balanced approach to the prebilling issues by voting for H.R. 555 when it reaches the floor.

Sincerely,

STEPHEN BROBECK,
Executive Director.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. KOGOVSEK) having assumed the chair, Mr. DORGAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 555) to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress through rate increases, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous matter on the legislation just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair welcomes back our chairman of the Committee on Rules. I understand he has had a severe cold and we are happy to have him back.

SAVING MONEY FOR MEDICARE

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure all of us are aware that medicare, within about 4 years will be in a condition that social security was before the recent Commission on Social Security recommended action with respect to that program. I introduced not long ago, following the precedent of what was done in respect to social security a bill to set up a bipartisan commission to deal with the problem of medicare. However, I am not pushing that legislation but giving the Ways and Means and other committees of the Congress an opportunity to work on that matter.

I myself, with my subcommittee of the Aging Committee, am working up on a method of approaching the medicare problem which will save money for the Government, reduce the cost of medicare for the people covered by it and provide more medical coverage for the recipients of medicare.

I hope to be able to lay those proposals before the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. I have a statement about this matter. I ask unanimous consent that my statement appear following my remarks in the RECORD today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the requests of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, 3 years ago the Reagan administration arrived in Washington with a promise to improve efficiency in Government. We were promised Federal spending would be dramatically reduced without shredding the social "safety net" which protects those of our citizens in need.

We were promised fraud, waste, and abuse—estimated as high as 20 percent in some programs—would be eliminated.

We were promised that Federal deficits would be reduced and the budget balanced.

We were promised medicare would not be cut.

We were promised social security benefits would not be diminished.

Unfortunately, the record of this administration questions their commitment to these laudable goals. In reality, the administration has not reduced Federal spending. Spending has reached record levels.

The administration has not balanced the budget. The Federal deficit has more than doubled during this administration and now approaches $200 billion. Outlays for interest on the deficit has increased by $32 billion in these 3 years.

What the administration has done is drastically alter our Nation's priorities. Defense outlays have increased by $90 billion while spending for domestic programs has decreased by $75.8 billion.

Social security benefits have been reduced.

Spending for housing, health, nutritional programs, legal aid and other services essential to the elderly has been curtailed. With every day ever more of our poor and elderly find themselves worse off than they were 3 years ago, while the rich get richer.

Instead of reducing fraud, waste, and abuse, as promised, the administration now says it does not exist. According to the director of the Office of Management and Budget, Federal spending cannot be reduced by increasing efficiency and curtailing fraud, waste, and abuse since "nearly every stone has been turned over."

MEDICARE CUTS

During the last 3 years no program has been more consistently assailed by this administration than medicare—

the critical program that supports the health of our Nation's elderly. Medicare has been forced to endure a barrage of attacks.

In 1981 medicare benefits were cut by almost $3 billion—80 percent of these cuts were borne by medicare beneficiaries.

In 1982 administration proposals would have reduced benefits by $2 billion more. Fortunately for the elderly, Congress rejected most of these proposals.

Last year, the administration again sought to reduce medicare benefits by billions and again most of these reductions—about 70 percent—would have been passed on to seniors.

Last Thursday, the administration renewed its attack on medicare. Once more it has requested more billions of dollars in medicare reductions and cost shifting.

THE SOCIAL SECURITY ADVISORY TASK FORCE

The recommendations of the administration's social security task force, which was to develop long-term solutions to the medicare crisis are consistent with these repeated attacks. The panel developed, in the words of its executive director, a "bite the bullet" agenda. Principal recommendations include raising the age of eligibility for medicare beneficiaries from 65 to 67, cutting benefits, and shifting costs.

The philosophy of the administration as it emerges from these actions would argue that the Nation's budgetary health can best be improved by burdening the sick and helpless, those most in need and least able to pay.

They argue that increasing the coinsurance and deductible amounts our seniors pay will cut down on abusive overutilization of hospitals. Unfortunately, there is an absence of reality to their basic assumption. It is not the older person who decides who shall be admitted to a hospital. It is not the older person who decides what services he will receive. It is not the older person who decides when he will be discharged. Those are medical decisions. The elderly neither enjoy nor profit from being hospitalized.

The fact of the matter is that the problems of medicare reflect its structure and incentives. These problems embrace questions of coverage as well as cost. Both of these issues must be addressed if the medicare crisis is to be resolved.

In the coming weeks, I will present legislation to address both these issues. As a first step, I have prepared a series of legislative recommendations to address the medicare solvency issue. I believe the projected medicare shortfall can and should be addressed without further adding to the burden borne by seniors—a burden that already equals or exceeds on average their pre-medicare, per capita health costs.

These proposals would, if adopted, cure the projected medicare shortfall and establish a surplus. They would eliminate the administrator's excuse for diminishing benefits and shifting costs. Most important, their adoption would allow us to look beyond the projected deficit to focus on the more critical issues related to restructuring the medicare program to more efficiently and equitably meet the needs of seniors.

RESTORING MEDICARE SOLVENCY

Despite Mr. Stockman's apparent belief, there still are vast areas of fraud, waste, and abuse in Federal programs. Under my direction, the House Select Committee on Aging identified many areas where programs benefiting the elderly can be improved and waste eliminated. Although many reforms have since been made, much more needs to be done.

1. CLINICAL LABORATORIES

In 1976, for example, the Senate Aging Committee conducted a review of the operation of clinical laboratories under State and Federal health programs. The committee found medicare and medicaid payments had not been adjusted to reflect changes in testing technology—principly the development of computerized equipment and automated testing. As a result, the committee concluded at least 30 percent of these laboratory charges were either being wasted or stolen.

In the intervening 7 years these findings have been validated by State fraud units; the Inspector General, Department of Health and Human Services; and the Federal Bureau of Investigations. But, there is reason to believe the problem still exists.

At my request, staff of the House Aging Committee, Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care obtained data comparing costs in Canada and United States (medicare prevailing charges) for nine common laboratory tests. The data gathered (reprinted below) reflects the charges of a profit-making company doing business in both countries. The company utilizes the same equipment and procedures in both countries.

As the table below indicates, medicare's payments (column 1) range from 304 percent to 718 percent higher than Canadian payments (column 2) for these basic tests.

MAJOR MEDICAL LAB'S PRICES FOR HIGH VOLUMES LAB TESTS (BIO-SCIENCE INC.) FOR AMERICAN AND CANADIAN BRANCHES

Name of high volume lab tests	Bio-Science's charges—		Proposed fee schedule prices
	American—Percent above Canadian price	Canadian—in U.S. dollars	Percent above Canadian price— Senate version—65 percent	House version—60 percent
Potassium	$8.25—382	2.16	$6.05—280	$5.58—258
Hematocrit	7.75—718	1.08	2.03—188	1.88—174
Urea nitrogen (BUN)	7.75—359	2.16	4.89—226	4.51—209
Urinalysis	7.75—718	1.08	3.15—292	2.90—269
CBC	8.50—215	3.96	5.75—145	5.31—134
White cell count	8.50—590	1.44	2.52—175	2.33—162
Protime	8.75—304	2.88	4.30—149	4.00—139
Platelet count	11.75—408	2.88	5.20—181	4.80—167
Sedminentation rate	7.75—539	1.44	3.70—257	3.41—237

Both the House and Senate have legislation pending which would begin to address this problem by establishing medicare fee schedules for laboratory charges. Payments for the six tests identified under the Senate version are printed in column 3. Payments for these services under the House version are printed in column 4.

The data gathered by my subcommittee supports the need for the pending legislation. It also suggests that even the more restrictive House version, which would save more than $2 billion over the next 5 years, may be too lenient and that additional savings are possible in this area.

2. CAPITAL COST

A second example where savings are possible by eliminating waste is provided by the General Accounting Office's recent review of capital costs under medicare and medicaid. The GAO found the acqusition of costs associated with the purchase of the assets of one hospital by another increased costs by $55.2 million. Interest expense for the 54 hospitals acquired increased by $62.5 million and depreciation expense increased by $8.4 million for a total increase in 1 year of $70.9 million. These increased expenses were offset by a $15.7 million increase in home office costs.

This audit is only the latest indication of one of the most persistent problems faced by the medicare program—the "churning" of facilities and capitalized equipment. Churning, or the sale and lease back of facilities and equipment serves only to increase the base on which medicare pays depreciation, allows interest, and pays a return on equity.

The same hospital—with an original depreciable valuation of $10 million on which medicare has been paying a depreciation expense—is then sold for $20 million and resold for $30 million. There is no change in building or equipment. There are neither increased services nor capacity for increased service—just a change in ownership and higher costs.

The result is that the taxpayer winds up paying for the same facilities and equipment over and over again in ever greater amounts. This drain on medicare and medicaid can be eliminated by the enactment of legislation which provides that the depreciable basis of any item or structure currently under medicare will be frozen at its depreciated value as of the date of enactment. In the future, the depreciable base of any asset would be its value as of the date initially recognized by medicare without regard to transfers of ownership or other changes in control or operation of the asset. The total impact of this provision is currently being calculated, but it is clear medicare savings would total many billions.

3. THE INTENSITY OF SERVICES ADD ON

The current hospital reimbursement system includes an add on to the projected market basket for "intensity of services." The rationale for payment is that it covers changes in technology and changes in the type and mix of patients. In reality, there is no substantial evidence to support the premise that these changes always add to a hospital's cost. In fact, changes in technology and methodology often contribute to lower costs through enhanced productivity and avoidance of more costly procedures and service as in the laboratory example above.

In addition, much of what is characterized as an intensity factor is, in fact, an anxiety factor. It includes the redundant and often avoidable prescription of tests, X-rays, and therapies springing more from the fear of malpractice than the need for certainty. In a recent report from the American Medical Association, for example, 40.8 percent of all responding physicians said they routinely order additional tests out of fear of malpractice. Twenty-seven percent of all physicians admitted providing additional procedures out of malpractice concerns. In the aggregate, the AMA reported this defensive medicine may account for 25-50 percent of the total cost of treatment.

This fear of malpractice is not unjustified. But there are other more constructive and less costly means of dealing with the problem than underwriting and encouraging unnecessary tests and procedures in the medicare program. I believe serious consideration should be given to the elimination or substantial reduction of this statutory intensity factor. If this one provision were changed, it, in and of itself, would nearly put the trust fund in actuarial balance.

As an offset and in recognition of the real costs associated with malpractice fears, I will support and work to develop legislation designed to equitably address physicians malpractice concerns.

4. RATIONALIZING THE DRG'S

My fourth suggestion for rationalizing medicare reimbursement relates to the "rewards and punishment" aspect of the new diagnosis related groups—or DRG's—method of hospital reimbursement under medicare. Under the DRG system—the efficacy and equity of which are cause for major concern—hospitals are paid fixed amounts for each DRG category into which they can categorize a patient. To the extent their costs are below the DRG payments they can keep the difference. If the costs exceed the DRG allowances that becomes the hospital's problems.

The adoption of this methodology assumed the Health Care Financing Administration has the necessary expertise to assure equitable calculation and allocation of the DRG's. It is now clear signficant modifications will have to be made in this system to avoid "windfall" profits for some hospitals and unjustified underpayments to others. I am also concerned the DRG system rewards some hospitals not for their own efficiency but for the inefficiency of others.

I suggest we consider a statutory change which would permit hospitals to retain 50 percent of the difference between their actual, reasonable medicare costs and the total of their DRG allowances. In the case of hospitals whose allowable costs exceed their total DRG allowances, they would be reimbursed by 50 percent of those excess costs but not more that a total of 10 percent above their DRG allowances. Thus a hospital whose costs exceeded its DRG allowances by 20 percent or more would receive 10 percent of their allowable costs in addition to the DRG reimbursement.

5. OUTPATIENT CARE

Another area where significant savings can be achieved and manipulative exploitation of reimbursement minimized is with respect to payment for hospital outpatient care. Outpatient care is not subject, at present, to the DRG limits so hospitals have an incentive to load up in their outpatient departments as well as to take DRG allowances and then discharge patients to further care—at additional cost to medicare—in the outpatient department.

To cure this deficiency we could require the establishment of DRG's, or related controls on hospital outpatient care, as of the date the DRG system becomes fully effective for inpatient care. Further, we should not pay on an outpatient basis for services to discharged inpatients where one could have expected those services to have been performed when the patient was hospitalized and paid as part of the DRG allowance.

CONCLUSION

The proposals I have outlined today, if approved, would erase the projected medicare deficit and provide a significant surplus. Their adoption would eliminate the cost concerns that currently dominate the medicare debate and leave us free to deal with the more important and difficult structural deficiencies of the program.

If we do not address these structural issues, any solution we find is likely to prove temporary and this vital program may never fulfill its intended purpose. I believe we can develop a comprehensive health program that truly meets the needs of the elderly equitably and efficiently. I hope to provide the House with legislative proposals which would meet this objective in the near future.

ON THE CERTIFICATION PROCESS WITH RESPECT TO EL SALVADOR

(Mrs. COLLINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks and include extraneaous matter.)

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, before the Kissinger report even reached the President's desk, Larry Speakes was quoted as saying that President Reagan would not agree to the recommendation to tie further funding to El Salvador to progress they make toward curbing violations in human rights. At first I was appalled, but then an optimistic thought occurred to me. Perhaps the President had finally realized what many of us have know for some time—the certifications he made in the past were hypocritical whitewashes and there will be no significant improvements under El Salvador's current tyrannical regime.

But no—now Mr. Reagan says he will agree to certification as long as he controls the certification process and not Congress. How are we to take him seriously? He has already made a farce of the certification process. Last November, he vetoed the certification bill we passed, the same bill we are debating today. When he had been required by law to certify that progress was being made in human rights in order to continue funding, he signed the certification in the face of blatant evidence to the contrary.

The facts are clear. Over 30,000 Salvadoran civilians have been murdered since 1980. The Catholic Church of El Salvador puts the blame for these deaths directly on government officials and their right wing paramilitary allies. Not a single verdict has been rendered in any of these cases. Eight U.S. civilians, including four churchwomen, and one U.S. serviceman have been murdered in El Salvador. All of these cases remain unsolved.

Almost 500,000 Salvadorans now live in refugee camps because they have been displaced from their homes by the violence of war financed and armed by the United States. In El Salvador today, there is no freedom of the press, no freedom of assembly, and no functioning judicial system. Civilian institutions are merely window dressing for the Army's control of the country. Any more aid to the current regime in El Salvador, whether it be labeled military or economic, is in reality further assistance to entrench the Army's control of the country.

Legitimate certification is only the tip of the iceberg of changes that must be made before we agree to more aid to El Salvador.

PROCUREMENT SUCCESS STORY

(Mr. BADHAM asked and was given premission to address the House for 1 minute and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker—

Waste, fraud, mismanagement. Those words have become popularly synonymous with the Pentagon procurement process. It is good, then, to be able to cite recent evidence counter to that image.

So began an editorial in the Wall Street Journal of yesterday, February 6. The article goes on to say that the Air Force had divided a huge jet engine contract between GE and Pratt & Whitney. This competition is expected to produce cost savings and a warranty system that shifts undue costs back to the contractor.

Another part of that success story has to do with the B–1 bomber, which has been reported to be well ahead of schedule and well below cost. And that is no small accomplishment for a $20½ billion program.

The Air Force already has documented $550 million in savings and General Thurman assesses that he might be over $1 billion in savings in the long run.

The major contractor has already saved about $500 million.

I commend this compliment to our procurement process that has been straightened up and straightened out by this Congress to the membership of this body.

The articles follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb. 6, 1984]

PROCUREMENT SUCCESS STORY

Waste, fraud, mismanagement. Those words have become popularly synonymous with the Pentagon procurement process. It is good, then, to be able to cite recent evidence counter to that image.

The big news Friday was that the Air Force had divided a huge jet-engine contract between General Electric and the former, exclusive contract-holder, Pratt & Whitney. The competition is expected to produce cost savings, plus a warranty system that shifts some costs for material failures back on the contractor.

Another success story also appears to be underway, involving the B–1. The B–1 bomber program, which Jimmy Carter killed and Ronald Reagan resurrected, is now two years into development and is well ahead of schedule and below cost. That's no small accomplishment for a $20.5 billion program, which some critics contended might cost nearly twice that. Much of the credit goes to an Air Force management that decided not to re-invent the wheel and to the multiyear procurement procedure that Defense Secretary Weinberger has been advancing.

The Air Force has already documented $550 million in cost savings, and the figure could reach more than $1 billion, according to Gen. William E. Thurman, who manages the B–1 program. He attributes the savings to the multiyear procurement procedure, which helps drive down unit costs by avoiding costly fits and starts in the production program. New incentives for cost savings have led, as well, to some smart engineering decisions to use available standard components, where possible, instead of designing new ones.

For instance, the B–1 will use the Air Force's standard radio equipment, and the radar will be the same one already developed for the F–16. On the other hand, the Air Force didn't spare any money in providing the B–1 with the special capabilities needed to replace the aging B–52s as America's penetrating strategic bomber; emphasis was placed on developing sophisticated computers, avionics and other electronic equipment both to protect the aircraft from enemy attack and to improve its ability to locate and destroy targets.

Contractors have been encouraged to save money under the B–1's fixed price incentive program, under which the government and the contractors evenly split the savings when an item comes in under budget. Rockwell, the major contractor, already has saved about $500 million. At the same time, aircraft assembly is moving ahead so briskly that the first plane may be ready as soon as next fall, about six months ahead of schedule. The last of the 100 planes is due by mid-1988.

The B–1's primary function will be to strengthen the U.S. nuclear deterrence capability through its ability to penetrate Soviet air defenses and its ability to find dispersed Soviet weapons. Greater Soviet deployment of mobile missiles threatens to weaken the U.S. counterstrike capability, since it is difficult to target U.S. ballistic and cruise missiles on these weapons. But the Air Force expects that the aircraft also can function as a long-range tactical bomber, carrying either conventional bombs or "smart" guided weapons. It may well serve a special role in projecting American air power into remote areas that are too distant for our current land-based or carrier-based tactical aircraft. Some British military experts believe that the costly war over the Falkland Islands might have been averted had the British had such a long-range bomber capable of interdicting the Argentine ships and thus capable of discouraging a seaborne invasion of the islands.

The handling of the B–1 appears to point the way for all new military procurement programs, entailing less congressional disruption of year-to-year budgeting and better incentives for cost saving. It demonstrates how much room there has been for improvement and how much more military muscle this country can acquire for its money through more intelligent procurement practices.

IS THIS ANY WAY TO RUN A RAILROAD?

(Mr. MARLENEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, I am enclosing an article by Roger Clawsen of the Billings Gazette, "Is This Any Way To Run a Railroad?" I agree, as I am sure many of my colleagues will: Burlington Northern Railroad is a conglomerate machine that has merged railroads across the United States and then left the ghostly remains to wither and die. When the godfathers of that terrorism make us a deal we cannot refuse, we know that more towns will die, more farms will die, the heavy hand of manipulation will strike again, and Economic hardships will ride rough over the people of this land. The potential uncertainty of abandonments and rate manipulation reek from every corner. How long can the people of this Nation allow this corporate terrorism to continue?

Frankly, I am dismayed with the ICC for its inability to focus clearly on the problem, and for the lack of leadership in this issue. The blame does not rest entirely with the carriers. The ICC's inability and unwillingness to responsibly administer the Staggers Act is a breech of public trust. The ICC has the ability to apply the tourniquet to stop this bleeding, and to apply it to all branch lines across the country.

I have introduced a resolution to better balance the interests of rail shippers and the public against the interests of rail carriers. I urge my colleagues to support my resolution, join the choir of protest, and to read Mr. Clawsen's article, which I have inserted in the RECORD:

IS THIS ANY WAY TO RUN A RAILROAD?

Once there were three railroads in Montana.

They smelled of creosote from crossties and the sweeping compound on the depot floor. They sounded like the tick of the station clock that was always accurate and the scream of locomotives that were always on time.

We called them the Northern Pacific, the Milwaukee Line and the Great Northern.

Then came the Burlington Northern.

The BN is not a railroad. It is a conglomerate, an efficient machine that merged two of those railroads and left the third to die.

The machine has neither mind nor soul.

Oh yes, it is prosperous.

The machine is fueled by its own prosperity, driving it to new growth and new levels of wealth.

Greed has a wit of its own, an instinct to gorge on whatever is available.

But this blind gluttony should not be mistaken for intelligence.

This reflex was evidenced when BN raised the rent more than 1,000 percent on a piece of land developed by Plevna as a city park.

The difference between the old rent and the new is only a few hundred bucks. But when the great machine rolls, it will not pass an ort on its way to a feast.

The machine's real fuel is in the coal fields. BN knows how much a utility can pay for coal. It knows how much a mining company must receive to cover costs of production and capital.

The machine burns the rest.

In some cases the machine's share of a coal sale is more than double that of the mining company, 10 times as great as the state's severance tax.

Even a machine is due a profit. And a profit should not go unhonored in any country.

BN is entitled to recover the cost of equipment and expenses and to a return on capital. This it does. And more.

A state-financed study indicates that BN receives "excess profits" totaling as much as $5.86 per ton of coal on a 1,300-mile run.

Multiply that by the 10,000 tons aboard a unit train, and multiply that figure by the hundreds of trains rolling each week and the final tally is staggering.

Here are some of the costs of the great machine's fuel bill:

If the Crow Tribe, owner of vast tracts of coal, negotiated contracts to mine 25 million tons a year, BN would demand the machine's share of the sale price. BN's excess profits would consume $52 million a year. But for the machine's avarice, every Crow family could have an income of more than $30,000.

Montana and Wyoming coal, low in sulfur, cheap to dig, could drive dirtier, deep-mined coals out of the marketplace in areas as distant as Chicago, Austin—even Tokyo. But the machine's greed makes them only marginally competitive, and—when the market sags—development stops.

While thousands of jobs, and hundreds of millions of dollars in mining company revenue, taxes and royalties and utility charges disappear into the machine's maw, the BN is busy killing towns that real railroads created.

The machine does not care that dismantling a branch line in Eastern Montana will make the production of wheat, now burdened by heavier transportation costs, a marginal endeavor.

The machine cares only for itself.

Railroads had a sense of tradition, a feeling for history and an awareness of people. Machines do not.

Recently the BN threatened to raze the old Billings depot on Montana Avenue if the city, or someone, did not cough up the cash to buy it.

Even the old land-scam artist Fred Billings had a feeling for people. Founder of this city and president of the Northern Pacific Railway, Billings engaged in business practices that would likely be indictable felonies today. But he left this city with two parks and a high school. His family later built the city a library.

Such philantropy was called noblesse oblige.

But machines have no nobility and are not obliged.

When the state sent BN a tax bill, the machine responded with an army of lawyers. Montana took a beating and meekly accepted half of what it deemed the BN's fair share.

How long will the people of Montana allow this machine to bulldoze unmolested through its economy, land and lifestyle?

A long time.

People have minds and souls and tend to treat other entities as if they were similarly constituted.

This is not to say the men and women working for BN lack souls, minds or compassion. They are mortal, neither better nor worse than the rest of the population. From section hands to division chiefs, they do their jobs and do them well.

But they work for and belong to the machine, and the machine has a will of its own.

The board of director's job is to squeeze more profit from all divisions. For it to pass up a chance to capitalize on BN's monopoly in the coal fields would be like a track gang foreman ignoring a cracked rail.

This system works well in most areas of American commerce where greed is checked by competition and by consumer reluctance to buy that which is overpriced.

In other areas, public regulation stops Ma Bell from charging $1.50 for a local phone call, and holding gas and electric companies to a fair return on capital.

But the machine has neither competition nor regulation.

So, we can only try to reason with it. We will appeal to its sense of fair play, to its compassion, its humanity.

But, lacking any of these attributes, the great machine will continue its mindless growth.

But the day will come, ages from now, when someone will realize that the machine has neither mind nor soul and ask, "Is this any way to run a railroad?"

The answer will be a deafening chorus thundering along the Rockies from Houston to the Canadian border.

PRO-LIFE PEOPLE

(Mr. PENNY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, today I am proud to submit for the RECORD an article by Pastor Lowell O. Erdahl, Bishop of the American Lutheran Church's Southeastern Minnesota District. It appeared in my church's publication, the Lutheran Standard on February 3, 1984.

Pastor Erdahl speaks eloquently for the need to discover and to create nonviolent alternatives to the solutions proposed by institutionalized abortion, war, capital punishment, and euthanasia. I commend this article to my colleagues.

"Pro-Life" is the slogan of the anti-abortion movement, but Christians should be pro-life in a much broader sense. In Christ, we believe that God is on the side of life. Christ came "that they may have life, and have it abundantly" (John 10:10). As God's people, we are created and called to be pro everything that enhances and ennobles life and anti everything that degrades and destroys it.

But what do we do when one life threatens another? Most Christians accept the taking of life in tragic, exceptional circumstances. Most people who oppose abortion make an exception for a pregnancy likely to result in the mother's death. The historic just-unjust war theory holds that it usually is wrong for a Christian to kill in war but that it may be right to do so in exceptional circumstances. Such thinking maintains an essentially pro-life stance while granting that it may sometimes be justifiable for a Christian to have an abortion or kill in war.

WHEN EXCEPTION BECOMES THE RULE

I agree that there are tragic, exceptional circumstances in which it may be right for Christians to take life, but I also believe we are tragically wrong when we allow the exceptions to become the rule. What once was permitted only in exceptional situations sometimes has become an accepted practice.

Abortion and war are among the most vivid examples of the exceptional becoming institutionalized. Abortion "on demand" has become an accepted, established practice in many nations, including the United States, since the Supreme Court's 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade. And while the just-unjust war theory says, in effect, "Don't fight in war or support war-making, except in justifiable circumstances," Christians long have supported whatever wars their countries happened to be fighting. Since war-making has become an accepted institution, the exception is no longer the willing participant but the conscientious objector. We have turned the theory of the justifiable taking of life on its head. Unable to oppose all abortions and all wars, we have, by sound and silence, sanctioned almost all abortions and virtually all warmaking.

Believing that we must "enslave" some criminals in prison does not require us to support the institution of slavery. Approval of lying in specific circumstances—as when people lied to save Jews from the Holocaust—does not require us to abandon the principle and practice of truthfulness. Nor does approving the taking of life in exceptional circumstances require support of institutionalizing those exceptions into established practice.

PRACTICING THE PRO-LIFE PRINCIPLE

We are called in Christ to be pro-life people who stand in consistent opposition to all institutionalized taking of life, including abortion, war, capital punishment, and euthanasia. Although each of these issues is agonizingly complex and merits lengthy reflection, I can make only brief comments here, suggesting a consistent application of the pro-life principle.

While granting the necessity of abortion in some circumstances, the pro-life principle rejects abortion on demand and the view that women have a personal or constitutional right to an abortion. I affirm equality for women and the basic goals of the feminist movement, but I believe that feminists are mistaken when they advocate abortion rights as the hallmark of women's liberation.

It is difficult, but not impossible, to write legislation that would deny abortion on demand and yet permit abortions in tragic circumstances. One significant step in that direction would be the adoption of a constitutional amendment making it clear that our U.S. Constitution does not guarantee the right to an abortion. As truly pro-life people, we will not only favor regulation of abortion but will also redouble our efforts to promote responsible sex education and birth control and to provide care for mothers and children in situations of unwanted pregnancy.

While granting the necessity of responsible and limited police power in a sinful world, I believe the pro-life principle calls us not only to work to eliminate the doomsday weapons that threaten to destroy everyone they are intended to defend, but also to abolish the institution of war itself. Realistic pro-life thinking recognizes that there will always be conflict among sinners and that peace is not the absence of conflict but the nonviolent resolution of conflict.

This means that pro-life people must not only oppose war-making but work to create a rational—and Christian—alternative to war. Since we are called in Christ to a ministry of reconciliation, of global perspective, and of the cross, I believe a "Jesus alternative to war" will include (1) greater emphasis on international negotiation and reconciliation, (2) building a global—rather than only national—security system in which limited police power is exercised under law through courts of justice, and (3) the development of what Gene Sharp, in The Politics of Non-Violent Action, calls "civilian based, nonviolent defense." Such nonviolent action is demonstrated not only by people like Gandhi and Martin Luther King, but supremely by Jesus' choice of the cross rather than the sword.

We cannot save the United States and establish justice and freedom for all humanity by destroying the world through a military "final solution" to our global problems. As stewards of life, we work for a better way. If that way seems impossible today, we must work to make it possible tomorrow.

ISSUE OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Many nations and many states within our country continue to practice capital punishment. Some people support killing murderers to demonstrate that murder is wrong. This strikes me as an odd and immoral way to demonstrate reverence for life—akin to raping to demonstrate respect for love and marriage. Others believe that capital punishment deters crime. Evidence is lacking to support this theory. Some murderers, such as Gary Gilmore, may even kill because capital punishment offers a means of committing suicide by dramatic execution. But I would oppose capital punishment even if it had value as a deterrent—just as I would oppose deterring theft by cutting off the hands of thieves. All such barbarism seems to me to be incompatible with the way of Christ.

CONCERNING EUTHANASIA

There is, thankfully, no established practice of institutionalized euthanasia in the United States, such as existed in Hitler's Germany. Shutting off machines that maintain bodily function following brain death is not mercy killing—the person has already died. Nor does the pro-life principle require the use of all extraordinary measures to prolong life in terminal situations. Tragic circumstances may permit passive or even active euthanasia. Gandhi, for example, said that if no remedy were available, love might require taking the life of one's own child to spare it from suffering the anguish of incurable rabies.

Nonetheless, we still need to vigilantly oppose any attempt to establish euthanasia (including infanticide) as an accepted practice within our society and to strongly support everything that offers greater meaning and dignity to the elderly and the infirm. If such vigilance seems unnecessary, we need only remember the shifts from justifiable exception to accepted practice that have occurred in relation to war-making and abortion. It can happen again.

If we are genuinely pro-life, we will grant the tragic exceptions while consistently opposing all institutionalized taking of life. We will resist the establishment of violence in any form to "solve" human problems. We will pray for wisdom and courage to discover and to create nonviolent alternatives to the "solutions" proposed by institutionalized abortion, war, capital punishment, and euthanasia.

God is on the side of life. Christ came that we "may have life in all its fullness" (John 10:10 NEB). Therefore I believe that we are called in Christ to practice the pro-life principle in everything we do.

EFFECTS OF ERA ON VARIOUS LAWS AND SOCIAL NORMS OF OUR SOCIETY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER), is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, this is the third weekly special order of a series of nine which I have reserved to examine the effects of the ERA on various laws and social norms of our society. The first two special orders were devoted to the ERA-abortion connection and the effect of the proposed ERA on our armed services. This special order will address the effects of the ERA on veterans preference programs.

When House Joint Resolution 1 was before the full House Committee on the Judiciary, an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GEKAS) to exempt veterans preference programs from the equal rights amendment. Unfortunately, it was defeated.

In hearings before the House Committee on the Judiciary's Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, a considerable amount of testimony was received indicating the pervasiveness impact the ERA would have on veterans preference programs. I would first like to examine several quotes so that Members can get the full flavor of their remarks:

Mary Frances Berry, in response to a question I posed to her, stated that under the ERA, a veterans preference program would be legal if there was equality in the pool of people who were to be drafted. There would not be any problem with veterans preference programs so long as women had an equal opportunity to be military veterans. This certainly suggests that existing veterans preference programs would not be upheld under the ERA because women were not drafted in World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict, or the Vietnam war.

Dorothy Ridings, president of the League of Women Voters, stated that:

Rules and policies that appear to be gender-neutral, but which have a disproportionately negative impact on women, will also be subject to rigorous scrutiny under the ERA. * * * For instance, the broad veterans preference statute challenged in Massachusetts v. Feeney, which granted an absolute lifetime preference to veterans seeking public employment in the Massachusetts Civil Service, would fall in any challenge under the ERA. The statute which did not include any explicit reference to gender classifications benefited a class that was 98 percent male and resulted in the virtual exclusion of women from senior positions.

Prof. Henry Karlson of the Indiana University School of Law, in response to a question from Subcommittee Minority Counsel, stated his agreement with Ms. Ridings of the National League of Women Voters that veterans preference programs would be subject to attack. He felt this to be the case whether the standard of review would be strict judicial scrutiny or an absolute standard.

Phyllis Schlafly, president of the Eagle Forum stated:

One of the effects of the ERA would be to deprive veterans of this small preference. It is a purpose of ERA, as shown by the President of the League of Women Voters. In order to prevent ERA from substantially hurting veterans, and amendment should be added to protect it from affecting veterans preference.

Prof. Thomas Emerson of Yale University School of Law stated:

The outcome of Massachusetts v. Feeney, which upheld veterans hiring preferences in Massachusetts, would plainly be different under the ERA. While the Massachusetts veterans preference statute considered in Feeney may not have denied "equal protection of the laws" (14th Amendment), it certainly denies "equality of rights under the law." The fact that there was not overt intention to harm women would not be decisive; the result arising from habitual patterns of exclusion was there for all to see and feel.

Prof. Ann E. Freedman of Rutgers University Law School testified that permanent or absolute preference in civil service jobs for veterans with a severe disparate impact on women, such as that challenged in Feeney, would be subject to strict scrutiny and the Government would then bear a heavy burden of justification. She stated the dissent analysis of the veterans preference statute in Feeney illustrates the approach required by the ERA.

Martha Barnett of the American Bar Association stated that:

Another problem of critical importance to the principle of equality is the Supreme Court's holding that discriminatory impact on women of an ostensible neutral rule is off limits to critical analysis under the 14th Amendment, except when the disparate impact can be traced to a purpose to discriminate. In Personnel Administrator v. Feeney, the Court refused to look at a Massachusetts veterans preference law so extreme that it resulted in total exclusion of women from the upper echelons of the Massachusetts Civil Service. The principle of equality is rendered impotent if it cannot reach laws which effectively exclude women from employment for which they are fully qualified and competent.

It is thus apparent that rules and regulations which are facially neutral but which have a disparate impact on women will be attacked if the States ratify the equal rights amendment. It is clear from these statements that the 5- and 10- point preference available for veterans who seek employment with the Federal Government would be jeopardized as would all States and local veterans preference programs. The ERA could also adversely affect the educationally disadvantaged Vietnam veterans who can be appointed under the Vietnam veterans readjustment appointing authority (VRA), to a position without having to compete with nonveterans for certain positions in the Federal Government.

If we accept the premise of Dorothy Ridings that the veterans preference challenge in Massachusetts against Feeney were to fall in a challenge under the ERA is true or subject to attack, how about other Federal and State veterans preference programs, compensation, pensions, loan guaranty programs, medical care, and retirement military pay. These programs certainly have many more male beneficiaries than women because women have not been subject to the draft.

As Leo Anderson, the Washington, D.C., liaison officer for State directors of Veterans Affairs, Inc., said in a letter to me:

We cannot lose sight, however, of the obvious invitations that ERA Amendment would offer for continuous and costly litigation regarding all aspects of its interpretation, including veterans preference. We can anticipate wholesale uncertainty and confusion regarding the meaning of any ERA Amendment with no promise of definitional resolutions in the foreseeable future.

Veterans preference programs were enacted over 100 years ago to help veterans get back in the mainstream of society after giving service to our country. It is a part of our proud and rich heritage. Veterans have not gotten rich in World War II, the Korean war, or during the Vietnam era; their monthly pay was an average of $76 in 1944, $144 in 1952, and $193 in 1968. It is unfortunate that many in the ERA movement have singled out to destroy the rights of 28 million veterans who have answered our Nation's call in time of war and are trying to destroy the rights of those persons who risked their lives for our country in the name of equality.

I hope when and if the ERA is again brought to the floor, there will be an opportunity to offer an amendment such as that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GEKAS), in committee, to insure that the rights and privileges of our veterans are not destroyed in the name of equality.

Mr. Speaker, I include an article appearing in the October 23, 1983, National Tribune, entitled "ERA: Women in the Military," by Dean K. Phillips; a telegram from E. Philip Riggin of the American Legion; as well as letters from the National Association of State Directors of Veterans Affairs, Inc.; Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and from the National Adjutant/Quartermasters Administrative Headquarters all be inserted in the RECORD immediately following my statement regarding the effect of the ERA on veterans preference programs.

[From the National Tribune, Oct. 20, 1983]

ERA: WOMEN IN THE MILITARY

(By Dean K. Phillips)

I have reviewed Rep. Sensenbrenner's letter addressing the ERA and Veterans' Preference Laws in which he stated that he is "disturbed as to how the ERA will affect veterans' preferences." He quoted testimony given on 14 September '83 by the president of the League of Women Voters to the effect that:

". . . the broad veterans preference statute challenged in Massachusetts v. Feeney (442 US 256) which granted an absolute lifetime preference to veterans seeking public employment in Massachusetts civil service would fail in a challenge under the ERA."

The Congressman concluded that if what the League President Dorothy Ridings said was true, the same rationale which would overturn veterans' preference in public employment could be extended to prohibit such preferences in education and other areas.

In her testimony the League president referred to the Feeney case after bemoaning "rules and policies . . . which have a disproportionately negative effect on women . . . and perpetuate the occupational segregation that isolates women into a few occupations with low status and pay."

With respect to that particular point, I am reminded of the pay (including combat pay) of the typical Pfc infantryman fighting in WWII of $76 monthly in 1944. This was raised during Korea and Vietnam to $144 (1952) and $194 (1968).

Despite the fact that the agony of our Nation's wars has been suffered almost entirely by men, and during Korea and Vietnam a disproportionate percentage of minority men, the League president ignores perhaps the most blatantly sexist policy in our history, the limitations of the drafting of those who will die and be crippled in combat exclusively to the male sex.

This was particularly significant during the Vietnam War when draftees suffered more than 60% of U.S. Army casualties in 1969 and 1970.

In her testimony the League president noted that at the time of the Feeney decision, only about 2 percent of this Nation's veterans were females. This fact has often been utilized by individuals like her to imply that "feminists" seeking equal employment opportunity were beating down the doors of recruiting offices and draft boards during Korea and Vietnam demanding to serve.

A statute did bar females from constituting more than 2 percent of the military. This law was on the books from 1948 to 1967. However, during that period, females averaged only 1.2 percent of the military.

Despite the fact that the 2 percent quota was lifted by Congress in 1967, females did not reach 2 percent of the military until 1973, after U.S. ground troops were pulled out of Vietnam.

During the decade of the Vietnam War, males repeatedly attempted to convince the Federal courts that the male-only draft denied men equal protection of the laws. In none of these cases did feminist organizations file motions with those courts claiming that the male-only draft during the war was unfair to women from either an equal protection or equal employment opportunity perspective.

Thus, while the League president bemoans veterans preference as unfair to women as a class, she fails to acknowledge the sacrifices of veterans at virtually no pay.

This is precisely the kind of reasoning that ultimately disgusted the general public not so much with the ERA itself (which I happen to favor) but with the anti-male ilk of feminists who identified themselves as the sole proponents of the ERA.

Little wonder that Congressman Sensenbrenner now has concerns about the ERA harming veterans education and civil service preference benefits. ED: "Era: Women in the Military" will be the focus of an all day hearing, October 26 by the subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Judiciary Committee.

[Western Union Mailgram]

WASHINGTON, D.C.
November 8, 1983

Hon. J. F. SENSENBRENNER, Jr.,
U.S. House of Representatives, Cannon House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

The American Legion takes this opportunity to advise you of its concern about possible misconceptions related to House Joint Resolution 1, the proposed equal rights amendment. Our specific concern is with the view stated by some over the last several months that adoption of ERA would eradicate veterans preference in the workplace. One such expression was made on September 14 during hearings held by your Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights.

While supporters of this argument correctly point out there are more male veterans than female veterans they fail to explain why there are disproportionate numbers of male veterans at the present time and what the male/female veteran numbers are beginning to show with the ongoing development of the All Volunteer Force.

The facts are rather obvious, females have been exempted from military conscription and even selective service registration—A long-standing policy engendered in laws passed by Congress and in Supreme Court decisions upholding Congress right to pass laws expressing this policy. However, the proportionate share of the military constituted by males and females can be expected to level off over the next several years as women continue to find military service a desirable career option in the All Volunteer Force. Once this leveling off has occurred, are we to believe that ERA advocates would continue their advocacy of dismantling veterans preference? The American Legion thinks not and for very specific reasons—vetern preference is gender neutral and will continue to be regardless of what sex the proportional statistics favor.

As you consider ERA, the American Legion hopes that you keep these thoughts in mind. We urge you to reassert your intent to continue veterans preference and we urge you to make that point clear throughout the development and debate of H.J. Res. 1.

E. PHILIP RIGGINS,
Director, National Legislative Commission, The American Legion.

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF STATE DIRECTORS OF VETERANS AFFAIRS, INC.,
Washington, D.C., October 17, 1983.

Mr. F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER, Jr.,
Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SENSENBRENNER: Thank you for your letter of November 4, 1983, requesting comments on the statement of Dorothy Ridings, regarding the effect of ERA on Veterans Preference.

The National Association of State Directors of Veterans Affairs (NASDVA) understands the Feeney decision to have determined that the relative numerical effect of a law such as veterans preference on men and women is irrelevant in connection with the issue of gender equality so long as that law does not verbally discriminate and the intent of such law was obviously neutral.

In the case of Massachusetts v. Feeney, the Supreme Court pointed out that veterans preference law served the admirable public purpose of compensating and rewarding veterans for national service.

NASDVA therefore believe that the Feeney decision would continue to be applicable even if an ERA Amendment to the Constitution was adopted.

We cannot lose sight however of the obvious invitation that ERA Amendment would offer for continuous and costly litigation regarding all aspects of its interpretation, including veterans preference. We can anticipate wholesale uncertainty and confusion regarding the meaning of any ERA Amendment with no promise of definitional resolution in the foreseeable future.

Your reference to the possible impact of an ERA Amendment as what you describe as "Veterans Preference in other areas", of course raises the spectre of an across the board assault under the aegis of ERA against the entire system of veteran and retired military entitlements; for the same numerical disparity as between men and women that exists for veterans preferences for public employment would be course also apply to compensation, pension, loan guaranty programs, medical care, retired-military pay and all other beneficial programs for veterans simply because there were and obviously will be in the future, many more male than female veterans.

It is therefore the considered opinion of the NASDVA that the passage of an ERA Amendment would constitute the opening of a pandoras box of dubious arguments which could and obviously would be used by anti-veteran feminists (most of whom are against National Defense and in favor of Unilateral Disarmament) to destroy the entire system of veterans and military retired entitlements as we now know it.

It is for these reasons that the NASDVA would not favor the enactment of an ERA Resolution by the Congress.

Sincerely,

A. LEO ANDERSON,
Liaison Officer.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., November 8, 1983.

Hon. PETER W. RODINO, JR.,
Chairman, Committee on Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: When your Committee sits to consider H.J. Res. 1 proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the Equal Rights Amendment, please be advised that the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States considers it imperative that the legislation be amended to the extent that "this article shall not be construed to affect any benefit or preference given by the United States or any State to veterans."

The VFW has no position with respect to the ERA, but we do, however, view as outrageous so much of Ms. Dorothy Riding's testimony wherein she blatantly stated that ERA would be used as a vehicle to attack veterans preference.

In addition, the legislation should be further amended to state "this article shall not be construed to require the assignment of women to military combat."

On behalf of the more than 1.96 million men and women of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I urge in the strongest possible terms that H.J. Res. 1 be amended as enunciated above.

Sincerely,

CLIFFORD G. OLSON, JR.,
National Commander-in-Chief.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., November 10, 1983.

To: All Members of the United States House of Representatives.

From: Clifford G. Olson, National Commander-in-Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

Subject: Amendments to H.J. Res. 1.

When the House of Representatives considers H.J. Res. 1 proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the Equal Rights Amendment, please be advised that the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States considers it imperative that the legislation be amended as follows:

1. "This article shall not be construed to affect any benefit or preference given by the United States or any state to veterans," and

2. "This article shall not be construed to require the assignment of women to military combat."

If these amendments are not made to the legislation, it will be wholly unacceptable to the more than 2.6 million members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and our Ladies Auxiliary and I would urge you in the strongest terms to vote against the passage of H.J. Res. 1.

Sincerely,

CLIFFORD G. OLSON,
National Commander-in-Chief.

NATIONAL ADJUTANT/QUARTERMASTERS ADMINISTRATIVE HEADQUARTERS,
Austin, Tex., October 12, 1983.

Attention: House Committee on Civil Rights and Constitutional Rights, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

Subject: House Joint Resolution 1.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Regular Veterans Association, the direct descendent of the U.S. Maimed Soldiers League (USMSL), founded August 10, 1880, by combat blinded, wounded, limbless and disabled Civil War veterans of the Regular Military Establishment, is concerned about certain aspects of the above Resolution. The USMSL and the Grand Army of the Republic (GAR), worked for, wrote and had the first veterans' preference placed in the 1883 Civil Service Act. As such, our Association has had a long and continuing interest in retaining this earned benefit for veterans on the Federal, State, County and City levels.

The R.V.A. is disturbed over the remarks of Mrs. Dorothy Ridings, President of the League of Womens Voters and her testimony of September 14. We are concerned that actions of this type will again bring suspect to every veteran who is a career civil servant and who performs his duty as set forth by government standards.

We are not opposed to Equal Rights * * * but we are opposed to reducing, modifying, eliminating or in any manner reducing the Veterans Preference. If this is to be the stand of this group, and all other groups, then the R.V.A. would review its position on Equal Rights and in all probability oppose the ERA by using our network of Posts, our publication and consider the communication media to openly take on any womens group. It is unjust when a group of women forget that over 700,000 women served in the Armed Forces, and their action would simply indicate to these women they were not appreciated by other American women.

I can say to you, if this bill would in any way effect Veterans preference in public employment, fields of education, programs of job training, loans for homes, farms or business, hospitalization, medical care, the position of this association is to openly oppose House Joint Resolution 1. You are authorized to place this letter in the transcript hearing or in the Congressional Record. Please keep us posted as to the action on this Resolution.

Sincerely,

JOHN B. ENGBERG II,
OCH, National Adjutant/Quartermaster.

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the question before us today is the ERA and veterans preference. As we know veterans preference gives those who have served in the military an advantage in competing for civil service jobs. The intent, of course, is to recognize and assign a special value to the experience of those who have served in the military.

I know there are those who feel our service men and women receive too many benefits already. I do not happen to share that view. I do not think it is possible to put a price on the service rendered to this country by our men and women in uniform and by their families. You cannot replace the years served overseas without family, or the hardships the family may encounter together but constantly on the move. These experiences take a toll on the human spirit and it is only through a series of benefits that we can hope to make military service worthwhile.

The fact that a disproportionate number of veterans are men gives us every reason to believe this benefit, and perhaps other veterans benefits as well, will be challenged as unconstitutional under the ERA. Now there is no intent within the veterans preference to discriminate against women. There are many women who have honorably served in our military and who are eligible for this benefit. All veterans may be eligible for advantages in Federal employment. But because the overwhelming majority of veterans are male, passage of an ERA without a veterans preference amendment might well result in eliminating this important benefit for all who have earned it.●

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, there is a vast population of men and women in this country whose selfless and honorable sacrifices secured the very foundation of this Government. I am speaking, of course, of the men and women of our Armed Forces.

A grateful nation, in what is only a token payment for those sacrifices, offers its veterans opportunities for employment to offset the hardships often incurred in military service.

There is no question in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that such treatment, while termed "veterans' preference" is really our obligation to our soldiers.

This Federal—and statewide—obligation has been a part of our society for more than 100 years. The Congress, through the various veterans' preferance acts, has frequently expressed its will in this regard, particularly for the disabled veteran, who bears even a greater burden as a result of his or her commitment.

We have all benefited from veteran employment, the veterans employed in the Federal civil service have always been reliable, dedicated workers, and they have served this Nation well. I have little doubt the same holds true for veterans employed as State civil servants and veterans employed in the private sector.

I believe we would all be losers if veteran employment benefits were threatened with broad-cutting legislation of the kind typified by the ERA amendment.

Mr. Speaker, as I read the amendment, I see several threats to veterans' preference, among them:

The elimination of preference in hiring and retaining veterans in the Federal public service, particularly those who are disabled.

The elimination of many State, city, or county hiring and retention preferences afforded veterans.

The elimination of Federal preferences given to disadvantaged Vietnam veterans.

Mr. Speaker, on September 14, 1983, the president of the League of Women Voters of the United States testified before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee. At that time, she pointed out that a Supreme Court decision in a Massachusetts case would fall if the ERA was enacted. Although that statute is broader in scope than many other State laws, it is not unlike many aspects of Federal law, which would, by logical extension, be subject to court challenge if the ERA is enacted.

Before I can consider supporting the equal rights amendment, I need assurances from the proponents that veterans would continue to be accorded the benefits of employment preference. I look for that assurance not only for myself, but for all the veterans organizations as well as the men and women of our Active-Duty Armed Forces.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

THE IMPORTANCE OF PRAYER IN SCHOOL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, this special order is on the importance of prayer in school. I want to talk about the fundamental change which I think is beginning to take place in the American body politic. That change really starts us moving, I think, away from the liberal welfare state and toward a very different future.

One of the keys to that change is the shift from materialism, from a focus purely on money, and from a focus purely on what are we going to spend next and how much are we going to spend and how we are going to spend it. We are heading back toward a world which is more spiritual. In this world the power of the mind, the power of the will, and the power of discipline are all important.

Interestingly, I first began to realize how far we had come astray intellectually in our whole attitude toward life while I was reading Gary Will's brilliant book on the Declaration of Independence entitled "Inventing America."

Will, in his book, describes the men who went to the Continental Congress and who passed the Declaration of Independence. In his description of George Washington, Gary Will makes the point that in the modern age, liberal historians cannot describe Washington because he does not fit the boundaries of their minds. He goes on to say that Washington's great power, and his great influence, were a matter of moral force. George Washington was a big man, not just physically larger than the average in his time, but in a spiritual sense. In terms of what the Romans called persona, he had a greater persona that that of normal people.

In that setting, I began to realize that Gary Will had placed his finger on something very deep and very important, indeed: In the modern liberal welfare state moral force never counts. With the singular exception of Martin Luther King, Jr., there are no spokesmen we would think of as being morally leaders, who in fact have legitimate drive.

If anything, in the liberal welfare state, moral leadership is suspect. It is rapidly churned into an effort to look under your bed, an effort to persecute you, and an effort to be in some way judgmental. I come back to that because I think that the power of the whole issue of whether or not our children should be allowed to pray in school is at heart a cultural battle. It is not just a battle of the spirit in terms of whether you are Christian, Jewish, Islamic, or have any other form of belief in God, in a greater being. It is also in a deeper sense a cultural fight between two forces: There are those who believe the world is purely materialistic, that in fact we came genetically from some prior body and when we die we will cease to be here. They believe the world is purely random chance added up into molecules, and that only a materialistic answer can explain our existence. On the other hand, there are all of the other forces in the culture which would argue that, in fact, there is more to life than simply budgets or numbers or materialism.

I was reading Bernard DeVoto's great study, "1846, Year of Decision." DeVoto is one of the great historians of the American West. At one point he talked about the silly mythology of materialism and the notion that we try to explain in the modern age what really drove our ancestors to conquer the West, to create a nation, to open up a continent. He says "if you take away the dream, you take away the power of the spirit. If you take away the belief in a greater future, you cannot explain America or Americans in the 19th century; that we were a people who believed there was a promised land; we were a people who believed we were chosen by God to create a greater world; that we really believed in the destiny of America and that that phrase coined in the 1840's, that we had a manifest destiny; that there is a spiritual richness which is greater than sheer economic power."

It is ironic in the 20th century that the liberal welfare state has had its greatest difficulties in foreign policy in dealing with movements, whether it is Ho Chi Minh and the North Vietnamese or any other guerrilla movement. It has also had great difficulties in trying to analyze statistically what is a moral movement. For example, even if you oppose communism as I do, even if you are deeply opposed to the Communist Party and the efforts of the Communist Party across the planet, its great power has been a moral force—the willingness of people to die.

Recently in Beirut we saw this. There was shock in America that a man would get in a truck, drive that truck into a building, and die for a cause he believed in. Yet in many ways Khomeini's revolution is a revolution of moral force in Iran. It is a step toward a world which says there are things more important than whether you can drink Coca-Cola or Pepsi Cola, whether you can, in fact, fly on an airplane, or whether you can buy a new suit. How does that all come back to America in the late 20th century?

There has been a bankrupt concept, what I would call the liberal welfare state, which has failed. It has poured more money in the central city to see the central city decay more. It has poured money into schools to see schools collapse without discipline. It has poured more money into police forces to find neighborhoods more violent than ever. It has tried by the use of money to buy ourselves a better future. In fact, because of that very emphasis on money, you can see Member after Member coming in and saying, "Ah, if you really believe in this, how many more billions will you spend this year?"

I would say to you that entire approach is bankrupt. The great failure of Lyndon Johnson's Great Society and the liberal welfare state was precisely this. By stomping out the spiritual aspects of life, by destroying those aspects that Gary Will described in George Washington as "moral force," and by eliminating the importance of all those other symbols that make people change their lives, the liberal welfare state crushed the very things it was trying to grow.

Let me suggest that the real meaning of the whole movement about voting for prayer in school is not some sanctimonious piety. It is not some effort to say that we should do in school what we do not do in church. It is not some effort to say that only saints should be allowed to be teachers. It is, in fact, a much deeper effort. It is the beginning of a cultural battle between those who argue that life is essentially material, that in fact children have no place in school thinking about God, and those of us who argue that in fact to suggest that life is material is to destroy the very meaning of life itself. We can show you schools which are very poor, but pray. As a consequence, they have no problems with discipline, no problems with homework, and no problems with obedience. On the other hand we can show you other schools which are very rich, but do not pray. Therefore, they have problems with violence with people vandalizing the schools and with an absence of homework. Maybe the liberal welfare state answer which is to spend even more money on the school which already has money, may not be the right answer. In fact, it may be precisely like giving an alcoholic more bourbon in the hope that it will solve his hangover.

Supreme Court Justice Stewart in his dissenting remarks in Abbington School District against Shemp really brought home the issue. I quote:

> The compulsory state educational system so strengthens a child's life that if religious exercises are held to be an impermissible activity in schools, religion is placed at an artificial and state-created disadvantage. Viewed in this light, permission of such exercises for those who want them is necessary if the schools are truly to be neutral in the matter of religion and a refusal to permit religious exercises thus is seen not as the realization of state neutrality, but rather as the establishment of a religious secularism.

I thank the gentleman from Indiana, DAN COATS, for his excellent "Dear Colleague" letter of February 8, which brought to all our attention both his own proposed amendment and the centrality of this issue. I thank the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. COATS) at a very appropriate time as he walks on the floor.

Let me say to my colleagues that the last line of Justice Stewart is an extremely important line. What the ACLU is doing is not establishing freedom of religion. It is establishing freedom from religion. What the ACLU is fighting for is the establishment "of a religion of secularism."

Let me suggest to the country at large that this religion of secularism denies the very central nature of spirit, of belief, of God.

Furthermore this religion of secularism, as Justice Stewart said, is in fact being imposed upon our children right now. I speak from personal experience because I have a school in my district in which young people can wear a Playboy Club T-shirt and nothing will be said. They can wear a Coors Beer T-shirt and nothing will be said. They can wear a Jack Daniels T-shirt and nothing will be said. But if they wear a First Baptist Christian Club T-shirt, the principal of that school would be put in jail, because there would be a Federal injunction against him.

I would suggest that when any form of belief or behavior in our society except religion is acceptable, but religion is outlawed by an act of the judge, that, in fact, we do have a systematic discrimination against belief.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think it is important that we understand what the very first words of the Bill of Rights are that all of this stems from. The very first words of the Bill of Rights are: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

Whenever this issue has been discussed, we have heard a great deal about the establishment of religion and the wall of separation that has to exist between church and state in the view of some lawyers in our society; however, we hear very little of what the gentleman is speaking of and that is the constitutional guarantee of free exercise of religion.

What is happening today in our public schools and in many of our public institutions is that people are being denied the right to freely exercise their religion in this country. It is being done with prohibitions of Federal law, prohibitions imposed by the courts. That is precisely the antithesis of what is in the Constitution of this country.

Absolutely none of us would want a situation where Congress would establish a state religion. That is a given in this whole argument; but also we do not want Congress or the courts or some other entity of the Federal Government denying people the ability to freely exercise their religion. As the gentleman points out, that is precisely what is taking place in our schools today. That is what we seek to have corrected.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, would my colleague agree, if I might just for a minute ask the gentleman—is it not in fact the case that far from us trying to establish a state religion, it is the ACLU which by litigation is trying to impose a state religion of secularism on this Nation?

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. By denying the ability of people of various religious persuasions to bring their viewpoint into the schools, we are in fact establishing a state religion of secularism, which it seems to me is precisely the antithesis as well of the constitutional mandate.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank my colleague from Georgia for bringing up this special order on a topic that I think is of tremendous importance. At least it is of tremendous importance as soon as you get more than 10 miles away from Washington, D.C., where it is not viewed as such an important issue.

It seems to me, though, that the essential issue here involves the nature of the public school system to a large degree. If indeed the public school system is nothing more than an instrument of the state for teaching the state's values to students, then, of course, there is legitimate reason for questioning the right of the state to impose, if you will, a prayer; however, historically we have not thought of the public school system as an arm of the state which reaches into communities to impose the state's values; but rather, the state has merely assisted parents in developing community schools which presumably reflect the values of those parents and those communities.

It is in that context that I think the school prayer issue is of tremendous substantive as well as symbolic importance, because it reaffirms that essential principle, which is that the public school districts out there are assisted by the state, certainly, but they are fundamentally instruments of the community and they should reflect the community's values.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN. I have not been involved in the discussion of this issue previously on the floor of the House. I happen to share some of the concerns that the gentleman expresses about the court decisions that have prohibited certain religious activities in my home community of 250 or 300 people, activities that in the history of this country were carried on without question, activities that in my opinion did not impose any sort of state religion on anybody. But by the same token, even though I recognize the gentleman's concerns and support many of the things that the gentleman is discussing, the gentleman addresses his broad concerns in the name of prayer in school alone.

Now, I prayed in school. I grew up in a small town high school class of nine, graduated in the top five someplace. As I recall, we prayed every day. Nobody ever raised any questions about it.

The question I have, though, is when the gentleman packages his idea as prayer in school, what prayer are we talking about? Who is going to write the prayer? Does the gentleman have in mind that all faiths will use the same prayer? Is it a special prayer that we could be discussing here today? That always bothers me. Who is going to establish this prayer that the gentleman wants to establish in the school system in this country?

Mr. GINGRICH. I think the gentleman asks a very thoughtful question. Fortunately, the gentleman from Indiana has been developing an approach which we think meets precisely that concern.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from North Dakota raises a very legitimate question, that is of concern. It is of concern not only to those who oppose prayer in school amendments, but even those who advocate it, because while we recognize that the school that we are used to, that we grow up in, might compose the kind of prayer that would be acceptable to us, but would not be the case throughout the country and may in the future not be the case in our own school districts.

I think one of the weaknesses of some of the amendments that have been before us is that there was no specific prohibition against involvement of the state or involvement of the school authorities or others in authority in terms of the form or the content of the prayer or the religious activity.

I have drafted a school prayer amendment which specifically addresses those issues which I think is an improvement on some of the prayer efforts that are here. I would be happy to share that with the gentleman.

It specifically prohibits any state involvement in the form or content of the religious activity or the religious prayer that is before our schools and that is a very legitimate concern that we ought to address to protect minorities. I think that we had better get to what the framers of the Constitution were talking about when they wrote the first amendment.

□ 1600

But the point I would like to impress on the gentleman is that we should not allow disagreement over how the amendment should be worded to prohibit us from debating that on the floor. I regret that we have to have a few of us here talk about this after the legislative business has concluded, after people have gone back to their office when 80 percent of the American people support or at least are debating the issue.

Let us get it up here on the floor of the House of Representatives. Let us get the thing discharged from the committee where it has been buttonholed and held down year after year and let us talk about it.

We can then discuss and debate in the form that has been given to us by the Founding Fathers whether or not we should have an amendment and how that amendment should be crafted. But what I regret is the fact that we come over here and the only way we can talk about it is to come over here after the legislative session. We cannot get the leadership of the House of Representatives to bring this bill forward where we can discuss it on the floor.

Mr. DORGAN. Will the gentleman yield once again?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN. I am still unclear about the prayer itself. Again let me say that in my hometown where you have a small gymnasium and you have the Lutheran League group that wants to go and use that gymnasium, they ought not to be prevented from doing that. So I think the court has overstepped its bounds.

But when you talk about a prayer in a school where a third of the children may be Protestant, a third Catholic, and a third Jewish, what kind of a prayer are you going to introduce in that classroom?

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the genteman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I think the gentleman raises an interesting point. But there is an ultimate safeguard and I just raised the point.

The gentleman went to a school somewhat smaller than mine, but really we come from essentially the same region of the country, German, Scandinavian background. My hometown was a little larger than the gentleman's, about 2,300 people, and we went to school at about the same time. Yet we never prayed in my school.

The point I am making is that there is no requirement that a community insist on prayer in its schools. I would suggest to the gentleman that communities of great religious and ethnic diversity probably will choose not to for just the reason the gentleman has cited.

Mr. DORGAN. If the gentleman will continue to yield, you are not suggesting I turned out better than you because I prayed in school, are you?

Mr. WEBER. I do not know. I do not know the cause of the gentleman's intellectual superiority. Maybe that had something to do with it.

Mr. DORGAN. I was not using the superiority as a given. I was just suggesting that I do not know whether there is a cause and effect between success and prayer in school. I am curious when you package this as prayer in school what prayer are you talking about?

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me remind the gentleman. You may not have been with us on the floor the other day when the very distinguished majority whip came on the floor and we were talking about this. Let me clarify the point the gentleman from Indiana is making, and some of us suggested that possibly we might bring up the prayer in school issue in the broadest sense. We might devote 1 or 2 days of official business of the House to debating it. I think we could encourage gentlemen like yourself to offer amendments that would clarify and safeguard and protect.

The gentleman, your party's very distinguished whip, said to us, "Well, we have dealt with prayer in school in 1969. We voted on it."

I am not sure what the gentleman was doing in 1969, but I know one of our Members I believe was in high school. Several of us were in college. One or two of us were barely into the labor market. And we all thought it was very exciting that back in this period when we were young, eager, and excited that the distinguished majority whip dealt with prayer in school. But we also thought that possibly this is an issue which over 80 percent of the American people support. It at least deserves the majority party bringing it to the floor in an orderly and systematic manner, with an open rule it would be, to allow people like yourself to then raise that issue. We would then look forward to your help in arranging for that opportunity.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I think, though, what we need to do is to be somewhat specific in answer to the gentleman from North Dakota because it is a question raised very legitimately about this issue.

What we have always talked about is voluntary school prayer, and that carries with it a number of different options. To answer the gentleman's question, it carries with it the option of some schools to have a moment of silence for prayer. Within the schools that would be a voluntary school prayer program.

It also carries with it the option of allowing each child to compose a prayer and repeat that prayer at some point during the function of the classroom. That would be an optional kind of program that would assure that all of the diversity that was within that classroom got represented at some point or another.

It carries with it the option of setting aside times for only those people that wish to participate to go to a special ceremony of some sort.

There are all kinds of options that are available, providing you pass the amendment. But if you do not pass the amendment, none of those options are available and that is the problem out there right now. The communities do not have the ability to set up programs of a similar type to what we engage in in the House of Representatives every day.

I do not hear anybody coming on the House floor and questioning who composed the prayer that we had before us today. We all know that the person at the podium composed the prayer and there is no question about it.

All we are saying is that in some similar way in the classrooms and in the public schools of this country that American schoolchildren ought to have the benefit of the same kind of spiritual beginning to a day in public life.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. And in that spirit, in fact, of today's prayer, I yield to my good friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. GEKAS).

Mr. GEKAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to ask his immediate forgiveness for being on that side of the aisle which has received much of his criticism. You can pretend for the moment that I am at the microphone on that side.

Mr. GINGRICH. We know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is with us in spirit no matter where he is geographically.

Mr. GEKAS. I, too, have pondered long over the question of voluntary prayer and had wondered whether even while I was taking my particular poll in my district to determine how the people in central Pennsylvania felt about voluntary prayer, and I was not surprised by the result, which was 75 to 80 percent in favor of voluntary prayer.

But after the results came in, a thought came to me: Did I fail in my mission of trying to determine what the people felt because I did not try to determine through that questionnaire what the youngsters felt. Was it an important element of our discussion here to determine what the youngsters in the middle schools and the grade schools and the high schools of our area felt about voluntary prayer?

The answer came to me out of the blue, so to speak, because a group of youngsters in Williamsport, Pa., brought the matter to such a head that it is now the central issue in a case before the Federal courts.

It is they who wanted voluntary prayer. They went to extremes to try to get together young people of the same ilk, of the same persuasion, of the same feeling about voluntary prayer within the school and formed a club for that purpose.

Part of the answer—and I wish the gentleman from North Dakota had remained on the scene, because I wanted to tell him that the youngsters will take care of those lapses and those vacuums that we do not discuss here today themselves. They will prepare the proper prayers. They will get together and make it known to the school districts what they feel is a proper vehicle and a proper manner in which to express their religious prayers in a day's time.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I would just like to say that the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is really a tremendously encouraging thing. I think it reflects something that is happening throughout our culture as a whole.

You think about this institution of the House of Representatives and in recent years a large number of prayer groups and Bible study groups have been organized within the House of Representatives. I belong to one that meets on Wednesday morning. I know the gentleman from Indiana belongs to another one. There are a variety of groups like that that meet here within the institution in which we spend most of our waking hours, if you will, working and making friendships and doing our business.

If that is a reflection of a broader cultural trend, if you will a spiritual renewal, if I can presume to even suggest such a thing, is it not then unfortunate that it is the highest court in the land that is in essence prohibiting the younger generation from doing precisely what we do here in their institution in which they spend most of their waking hours and days learning, doing business, making friendships, and developing their values, because they really are trying to emulate in many ways precisely the same phenomena that occurs in the House of Representatives.

We are permitted to do it on public property. They are not permitted to do it on public property.

Mr. GEKAS. If I may recapture the time, I just wanted to add one caveat to what I am saying. If I had my druthers, as we say, about what course voluntary prayer should take in our country, in its reentry into our school lives, I would prefer the kind of solution that was found by these youngsters in the Williamsport area high schools. That is, the club, the symbolism, and reality that emerged from within the students in the school body itself.

I do not know whether we need a constitutional amendment really to accomplish that. It awaits the outcome of the case which is now in the federal system. But one way or another, it is predictable, and that is why I am so grateful to the gentleman from Georgia for having this little symposium.

One way or another, voluntary prayer is in the near and far future of our legislative actions.

□ 1610

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER).

Mr HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the question posed by the gentleman from Minnesota regarding the irony that we pray here in the House of Representatives, we have prayer meetings and yet the children in our schools throughout the land are not allowed to pray. I think that has been decided by the Supreme Court and I think that the reason they have made the decision the way they have is because they feel that perhaps Congressmen need to pray more than the schoolchildren do.

I think that is probably the guts of their decision.

You know, the gentleman made a great point; he said the children will take care of the substance of the prayers. Now that remindes me, the gentleman from North Dakota was saying "Well, what prayer do you have in mind? What is a prayer?" That to me is akin to a body deliberating, for example, over whether or not they should pass legislation relating to the institution of marriage, and one of the gentlemen, or Congressmen, gets up and says, "Well, just whose marriage are you talking about?" Or "Who did you have in mind to marry?" Or "Just what individuals are we talking about?"

Obviously the individual children in the schools are going to come up with the substance of the prayers. They are going to take care of that problem themselves. I think it is going to go much more smoothly, much more smoothly than that projected by the opposition on this House floor.

I think that problem will be taken care of.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) makes an excellent point in that the American people have put the school prayer issue high on their agendas. That issue has a high priority and a high approval rating with them.

This House and the Democratic leadership in this House is not letting the issue come forward for debate. I think that is the key issue we are talking about today.

I appreciate the gentleman from Georgia giving us time to comment on it.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MACK).

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to address myself to the question of the constitutionality. That has been raised. Certainly the question of what kind of prayer is one that will be debated for a long, long time.

I guess the comments that I want to make kind of come from some personal experiences.

Mr. Speaker, I come from a family of eight children. I was raised Catholic. I have an older sister who is a Catholic nun. I have a younger brother who is a Baptist minister.

I would suggest that in a family of eight children when you can have that kind of diversity, I would suggest that in this great country of ours we can find the kind of diversity with respect to prayer that we would like to express.

The second point is one of the experiences I have had over the past 5 or 6 years was involvement in some drug rehabilitation programs that we developed in Lee County, Fla., to try to help the children in our community get over or to throw this habit of drug use.

As I started to investigate these different types of programs, whether it was the Palmer drug abuse program in Texas, whether it was the Straight program in Sarasota or the Life program in Sarasota, Fla., the one common thread that held all of these together in trying to get people headed back in the right direction again was their belief and their discussion and their willingness and their ability to talk about their belief in a Supreme Being.

It seems to me we ought to have that opportunity to let our children have that same opportunity.

So I appreciate the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) yielding and giving me an opportunity to express those thoughts.

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

I would simply say that the great dividing line in the late 20th century America is not between Baptists and Catholics, whether they are in the same family or not; not between Christian and Jew, it is in fact between those who believe that there is a spiritual being, that there is a world that is spiritual and that cannot be described in dollars and cents or econometric models or any of the modern computerized numbers that dominate this city and those who, frankly, would drive God and the talk of God and would drive the spirit and would drive the soul and would drive anything which is nonmaterialistic out of our system and would then demand of our system that it give the fruits of life which are only attainable, as the gentleman said about those young people who had been saved from hard drugs, precisely because they have found a meaning beyond their materialistic gain.

I think that is the great dividing line in this society, between those who in fact fear a theocracy, feel that somehow we will impose a state religion more than they fear cocaine, more than they fear drunk drivers, more than they fear the reality of the world around them.

I would simply say that any citizen who lives in America today and can walk down the street of any average American city and go through any average American school and come to the conclusion that a religious dictatorship is a greater danger than mugging, robberies, drug use, or any of the other common everyday occurrences, is in fact a citizen almost totally out of touch with reality. The ACLU in that sense verges on paranoia, is almost psychopathic in its commitment to a vision of an American danger that simply does not exist, that is literally impossible except in the most esoteric salons of the liberal elite of this country.

I would be delighted to yield to the gentlewoman from Nevada.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

You know, I think there is another very important principle involved in this whole discussion of prayer in our Nation's schools. We talk about rights—the right to pray, and the right to not pray if that is your choice. But when we consider this issue, let us not forget something basic to our whole way of life.

Prayer, whether in schools or churches or in the home, establishes the attitudes, ideas, and beliefs that underlie our whole economic system. The success of the free enterprise system depends upon a reliance on the family unit, the work ethic, and an understanding of individual social and economic responsibility. So when our Government says "No, you can't pray in school," what we are actually doing is discouraging the development, in our children, of the very philosophies and beliefs that make our way of life possible. To deny prayer in schools is essentially to begin the process of dismantling the social and economic structure that binds this Nation together, and makes it work so well.

So I think we ought to be thinking about that.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. COATS).

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, I want to once again make the point, obviously those of us here feel very strongly about this issue, we feel if the matter were allowed to come to the floor of the House of Representatives, that the majority would see it our way, that the majority of the country supports that kind of thing.

I want to point out again here we are in a special order talking about a subject which we think the American people deserve to have a hearing on, that it ought to be before us not in a special order of this House of Representatives which allows any Member to come down and say anything he wants, but ought to be a part of the agenda of the House of Representatives.

It is very frustrating to us that something that is so much on the minds of so many people in the United States cannot even be placed on the agenda of the House of Representatives; that committee chairmen refuse to let it out of committee so that we can even talk about it.

If Members have reservations about the school prayer amendment, fine. Let us discuss these reservations. If we need to make adjustments in it to protect minorities or provide protections, fine, let us do that. Let us do it on the floor of the House, but let us let the majority work its will as we do in every other area of our society.

What we are really calling for here today is simply a chance to talk about it, to bring it up and let the majority work its will.

Yet we have been denied that time after time after time and it is frustrating that an issue of this importance to this country and to this Nation, we are not even allowed the opportunity to debate it.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman from Indiana makes a very valid point. I want to emphasize that over 80 percent of the American people believe that some sign of our spiritual commitment to God is legitimate. Over 80 percent of the American people have for 25 years been in favor of overturning the Supreme Court ruling and have been in favor of some kind of right to pray in schools. That means, for example, that if the prayer in school amendment were a human being, it would have voted now in three elections. It has been around that long. This is not something brand new that we put together this week in order to have something to do in this body. This body has had 25 years to study this issue.

I think the gentlewoman made one point which I want to make again before I yield. She talked about rights. People need to understand that we are slowly and inexorably moving toward a situation in which under the constant hammering pressure of the liberal left and the ACLU, will yield result. This result will be that somewhere in America, some day, a first grader will stand up and pray and be arrested. Now that sounds silly. You would say, "That cannot be in America." If we did that on a TV situation comedy, we would laugh at it. But I was really struck recently by something. My determination to fight on this issue was enhanced. On this day, I met with a group of pastors in my district who were very concerned about the parents in Nebraska who had been locked up because they wanted to send their child to a Christian school without State interference. Then, I heard a radio news report that Jodie Foster had been found with cocaine coming back from the United States, but there was "insufficient quantity to arrest her."

Now I thought to myself, what if I had described to you a nation in which a cocaine user would be let go, but seven parents who wanted to send their children to a school so they could learn about God would be arrested. That would sound like the Soviet Union, like Nazi Germany or a degenerate dictatorship. But you would not have chosen it in a multichoice test as the United States of America.

So I say that when the gentlewoman from Nevada talks about rights, we have to recognize that we in the Congress, unless we act, are permitting the courts to move slowly and steadily in a course of action: First of all, to browbeat by court decree the school boards, then to threaten principals, and finally to imprison parents. Literally, at some point in our lifetime some first grader will make the dire mistake of praying over an exam. He will then be thrown in jail because that will be the most illegal act available in that school that day.

And this is not a mockery. This is not some exaggeration. This is the long-term direction of court decisions for 20 years in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding because I would like to also build on the point made by the gentlewoman from Nevada about rights.

The Declaration of Independence is really the framework of the democracy which followed. Our whole constitutional democracy was based upon the framework laid down in the Declaration of Independence.

The Declaration of Independence was a statement of rights. It was also a statement of where those rights came from. The Declaration of Independence says that we are endowed by our Creator with certain unalienable rights.

Now, what we are succeeding in doing in our society at the present time is moving away from that idea that somehow rights now come from the Constitution or rights come from Government or rights come from men rather than rights coming from the Creator as recognized by our forefathers.

And it seems to me that that is a tragic loss in modern day society because if you accept that rights come from your Creator, you accept a certain spiritual value of life itself. And that is what we are losing in society today.

And it is interesting and people ought to do it, go back through that same Declaration of Independence from time to time, and where they are listing indictments against that King, put the word "Congress" in there, or put the words "Federal Government" in there and you will find out that many of the things that our forefathers feared from a large central government have, in fact, come true in 20th century America, from the source of central government, here Congress and the Federal Government as a whole.

So it seems to me that we ought to look back at that basic framework and recognize that once you lose the idea that rights come from the Creator, once you fail to acknowledge that Creator as a part of the whole spiritual value of democracy, that you have lost something very important. You begin to regain it when you put the kinds of things back into your public institutions, including your schools, that acknowledge God, that acknowledge the Creator as a part of the everyday life of all of its citizens.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me, if I may, before I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, make the point to reenforce what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said. Many of our most liberal and radical critics yearn back to Thomas Jefferson, and eagerly embrace Thomas Jefferson's strongest statements on this issue.

Yet, the fact is it is Jefferson who is the primary author of the Declaration of Independence who appeals to our Creator for unalienable rights. It is Jefferson who belongs to the first committee that drafted the first draft of the Great Seal of the United States which specifically talks about God blessing us. It is Jefferson who in his development of the University of Virginia, while providing for freedom of religion, suggests that students can go to any religious instruction they desire. He does not suggest they can cut out and not go to any religious instruction. He said they can go to any religious instruction they desire.

And this was generally conceded to be the most radical person supporting religious freedom in America in his generation among politicians.

So I would say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania in reminding us that Thomas Jefferson saw fit to base all freedom on rights given us by our Creator tied, in fact, the very fabric of freedom to a spiritual commitment and spiritual belief.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would yield further, I would say to the gentleman that the motto chosen by our forefathers in that Great Seal and for this country, "In God We Trust," was something of immense importance to them.

And it is inscribed over the head of the gentleman as he speaks from the well in this House. It says above the Speaker's podium, "In God We Trust."

And the question that we are raising here is whether or not you can put that motto in that form in the classrooms of this country. It is highly doubtful under what we have now done through our court system that that motto inscribed on the wall the way it is in this Chamber can be put into the public school classrooms. That just raises a question of where we have gone as a society.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER).

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to return to a point made by our colleague from Indiana (Mr. COATS) a few minutes ago about the fact that what is really unfortunate is that we are not able to get this issue on the floor of the House of Representatives to be debated and voted upon because the issue has been tied up for decades, literally, by the Democratic majority.

And I just want to make two points that I think are important in considering that.

As I talked to my constituents back in my district, there is a whole string of issues that they have talked to me about. They say, "Why doesn't Congress do anything about this?"

We could go through them all, but I think they differ from region to region.

The school prayer amendment probably better than any other single issue explains why there is a whole series of issues that Congress never deals with and that is because the values of this city are fundamentally different from the values of the Nation as a whole.

And I guess I would go a step further and I would say the values of the country are somewhat different than the values of the Democratic majority, at least as reflected through the priorities that they present to the Nation in the agenda of the Democratic Party.

Second of all, and I think it is tremendously important, those who detract from the notion of school prayer frequently refer to it in terms of a throwback. We are going to go back to school prayer.

I would argue that in this case as in many others the people of the country are, in a number of respects, way ahead of the politicians and they have recognized a basic change in our society that makes this issue more important, if anything, than it was in the past. And that is because as we have seen over the last 10 to 20 years an increasing percentage of a child's time is spent not with his parents, but with others, because of two-worker families and things like that, the school has become an increasingly important arena for the socialization of our young people.

As I have talked to teachers, for instance, they frequently complain about the fact—and rightly so—that today they have a much heavier burden in terms of assuming responsibilities that belonged to parents in earlier generations, but now because both parents are working, they cannot assume that responsibility.

I think that a lot of parents recognize that. And part of the reason—not the entire reason—that there is such support for school prayer is the understanding that if we are going to rely on the schools to a greater and greater degree to socialize our youth, there should be some recognition of the fact that it is important to this country that young people have spiritual values as well as materialistic values. And that is in a very true sense of the word. It is a progressive spirit that says that we should restore the right of the children to pray in schools and recognize the importance of that to a culture that is changing as rapidly as ours.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the gentleman made an excellent point in talking about the church in Nebraska that was in fact chained closed.

When you look at the situation with regard to prayer in school you can see exactly what happened and you can see some of the fears that the gentleman spoke of actually coming to be, because here you had a community of people who because their children were not allowed to pray in public schools, brought the school into the church in that small church in Nebraska.

And I arrived at the church the day after it was chained closed by the State, by the local sheriff. I thought it was a somewhat dramatic thing to have a church in the United States—it was probably the only church in the free world that was chained closed by a government authority.

I asked for the justification for chaining this church closed. And the justification was, well, the teachers in this Christian school are not certified. They have not got their proper certification to teach children so we had to chain the church closed because they are holding the school in the church.

Well, I asked for the results of the achievement test, if any, that these children had taken. And they sent back the results of the California Achievement Test, a standard test, of the children who were in that church and whose parents—presently I think some of the parents are still in jail for sending their children to this school—they sent back the results of the California Achievement Test taken by these children and they were 1 year to 1½ years ahead of their counterparts in the public school in the basic fundamental courses of reading, writing, and arithmetic. In other words, the children who went to this Christian school were far ahead of their public school counterparts and yet, their parents were, in fact, jailed primarily because they had brought their children into a church where they could have schooling and prayer at the same time.

□ 1630

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I would just like to point out—the gentleman from California I think is more familiar with this case than I am—is it not true that those Christian schools in Nebraska have agreed to permit performance evaluation of students to be used as a basis for their certification?

Mr. HUNTER. Absolutely. They said, "Listen, we will test our kids against counterparts of public schools," and the tests that they have taken show the children to be far ahead of their counterparts in the public schools.

Mr. WEBER. So the Christian schools in question have accepted the fact that they need to maintain certain quality standards and they are willing to submit to an evaluation based on the quality of the education they give their students, right along with the public schools. It is just a question of submitting to the State's will, if you will, on the question of certifying teachers.

Mr. HUNTER. Absolutely. The gentleman is absolutely correct. The bottom line to the problem, I think in part, is that if we did not have this problem of the Democratic leadership not allowing prayer in school to be even brought up for consideration, perhaps you would not have as many people having to retreat and retreat with their families from the public education system, because their children could then pray in school.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me, if I may, pick up on that and recount that there are two reasons why we have today's special order. The first is that we have heard that the other body will presently be bringing up an amendment on prayer in school. They will be giving the citizens of America the chance to have some impact on whether or not we should have a constitutional amendment to provide for prayer in school. But the other reason is, in the last 2 weeks, I have gone through a series of interviews and discussions which really communicated to me how deep the cultural division is in the United States. I had one interview, trying to explain what a number of us were doing on the floor of the House, with a reporter from a northeastern liberal elitist newspaper. He said, "How can you talk about prayer in schools? That is not a serious issue."

And, literally, it was transparent. He had no notion that there was any sense of legitmacy in the American people asking for their children to have the right to pray.

Recently several of us met with a broadcast network staff. They sat around at some length and said, "But you keep talking about values and traditional values and prayer in school. Those things do not count. What are you going to do about the budget? What are you going to do about this?" And they had a list of purely materialistic dollars and cents, taxes and spending. Nothing was allowed that was spiritual, that involved values, and that in any way changes the real meaning of life. These ideas were not allowed on the table because they did not exist in their minds.

Finally this occurred to me, as a former history teacher. Not since the Whig elite failed to understand the rise of Jacksonian democracy have we had a group so thoroughly and totally out of touch with the Nation as the elite that runs the liberal welfare state. That while 80 or 85 percent of the American people may believe in prayer in school, an overwhelming percentage of the people who are in charge of the power structure in Washington, the national news media, and of the liberal intellectual bastions around the country, genuinely have no sense at all of the power of the spirit or the power of the human will. That explains a great deal. As Halverston referred to this in "The Best and the Brightest" about Vietnam. By bringing in the best and the brightest of the liberal welfare state, we guaranteed people who would read computer studies and would have no idea of the staying power of the Vietnamese Army. These are the very same people who I think have misunderstood the power of fanaticism in the Middle East. They cannot appreciate what human beings can do when they have dreams that are large enough. These people do not understand what the gentleman from Florida said about the power of the spirit to change a young person from a drug addict into someone who himself is going to lead a wholesome life.

Many of them, seeking desperately to help minority groups, have no idea of the emotional power of getting people to believe in a dream to reshape their lives, to discipline themselves, and to go out and change the world. So they keep trying to find purely materialistic solutions that in fact have no relationship.

I come back again, as somebody said earlier—I think the gentleman from Indiana—to the prayer in the House. Every single day we meet, a guest chaplain or our own very eloquent Chaplain leads us in prayer. We do not have a censorship committee to screen it. We do not have any porkbarrel committee to make sure that we have 12.9 percent Baptist prayers, 22.3 percent Catholic prayers, 4.1 percent Greek Orthodox prayers. What we do is this. We rely on the basic concept that all of us are committed to the notion that this Congress and this country need God's guidance and God's blessings. As the President said, we would not presume to ask God to be on our side, but we would earnestly seek God's guidance so we could be on His side. We are confident that in that very commitment to a spiritual beginning each day that, over time, our chaplain will reach out in a manner to include all faiths, and all religions. And I emphasize, as I said earlier, the real battleground is between everyone—Jew, Catholic, Protestant, Muslim—anyone who believes in a spiritual life, and in God, and those on the other side who are against any extension of civil life to include the Divine and the life of the spirit and the soul. That the real civil war is in American cultural life. There are those of us who think we have to look beyond ourselves. We believe that there is in fact a spiritual being greater than you and I, that there is in fact guidance from above, and that we all do in fact sin and fall short of the glory of God. This really sticks in the craw of the liberal elite. It leads them to totally misunderstand us and, I think, to some extent, to live in a cultural paranoia.

Let me say that in this sense, in this spirit, it is fascinating that the New York Times last Friday, in a vicious editorial, attacked the President of the United States because he would state in public why he was a Christian. In an absolutely ruthless editorial last Friday morning, they suggested that there was something fundamentally wrong with the President of the United States describing his commitment to his faith.

Now, I would suggest to you that this is the exact reverse of the spirit of 1928 which was against Al Smith because he was a Catholic. We have now gone to a new bigotry. The new bigotry is against you because you are publicly willing to commit to anything. This President happens to be Protestant. But I suspect if we had a Jewish President and he or she were to stand up and to say that in fact they were deeply committed to God, the New York Times would be equally offended. They would say that in fact they are to believe only in the New York Times, Harvard University, and the ADA platform. They would say that any spiritual life is somehow, from the New York Times' standpoint, demeaning and disgusting.

So I think what we are trying to do is to suggest that there has been I think a deceitful double standard on the left. They demand perfection in praying but accept total failure in drug use, alcoholism and other hedonistic behavior. They stand up and offer all sorts of smokescreens as to why we cannot meet. In fact, the time is coming when this Congress should this year raise the issue. It is encouraging that the other body will soon do so. It is time that this House set a schedule. I would hope that the Democratic majority will admit publicly to setting a schedule for debating and voting on this.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am glad the New York Times did not write an editorial about Benjamin Franklin's very eloquent request that prayer be observed by the Constitutional Convention. I think that our history and our heritage of the business of this Government beginning with prayer goes back beyond this, earlier than this Convention. But I would like to read the words of Benjamin Franklin:

> I have lived, Sir, a long time, and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth—that God governs in the affairs of men. . . . I also believe that without his concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the Builders of Babel: We shall be divided by our little partial local interests; our projects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and bye word down to future ages. . . .
> I therefore beg leave to move—that henceforth prayers imploring the assistance of Heaven, and its blessings on our deliberations, be held in this Assembly every morning before we proceed to business. . . .

I wonder what the New York Times would have editorialized about that statement by Benjamin Franklin at the Constitutional Convention.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think the gentleman makes this point very, very well.

And let me say, as we close, that I think people in this country need to understand what is at stake. We must understand this when we talk, as I did, with students who are forbidden to wear a T-shirt that happens to have the name of their church when they are allowed to wear any other kind of a T-shirt, we are talking about America today. When we talk about parents being put in jail in Nebraska because they sent their children to a Christian school, where the children were doing well but not doing according to the State power, we are talking about America today.

We must keep this in mind even if we look at the great issues of nuclear war, of the problems in Lebanon and El Salvador, and of a drug trade which strikes at the very heart of our Nation. I am not sure there is any greater or more important issue than the underlying cultural issue that is symbolized by prayer in school. And that underlying cultural issue is very simple. Do we as a nation exist purely as a secular state committed to doing everything we can in this life to living it up, to knowing that after death there is no meaning, to seeking no guidance, and to committing what Dostoevski called the greatest of all sins, the sin of pride? Or are we in fact as our forefathers were, and as the gentleman from California so eloquently reminded us about Benjamin Franklin, really a nation founded in the belief that our Creator enables us to be free, are our rights protected not by the Constitution, not by the FBI, and not by the Supreme Court? Our rights are protected by the Creator who endowed us with those rights. It is to Him that we repair when we are in danger.

This year, I think, for the first time in my lifetime, this city will see a great struggle over which way we are going. For 30 years, the liberal welfare state has sought its solution. It has produced drug addiction, the collapse of the central city, a crime rate in Detroit so bad that I heard the mayor of Detroit this morning calling for a summit conference to be able to deal with crime.

We have seen a situation, and I do not pick on Detroit, that is endemic to America. For 30 years we have sought materialism as a solution, and materialism, as Kessler said. is the God that failed.

It is time now, I think, to have that debate. We call on the leadership of this House, the Democratic leadership, to allow the people of America to see where their representatives stand, and to have a debate. It is time to have an open rule, to allow people with legitimate and genuine questions to raise amendments. It is time in the end to have a vote up or down on whether we turn back toward a world in which God and the life of the spirit does have a role to play in schools or is it time to continue down a road of decay in which no amount of money, no amount of resources, can possibly stem the tide of decay without turning. I think it is time to come to a different stand, and without turning back to a world in which God, in fact, does matter.

VIGILANT OVERSIGHT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, "Quite as important as lawmaking is vigilant oversight of administration." And this, Mr. Speaker, was long before the days of the "administrative state" or the enormous growth of the Federal Establishment that has taken place over the past 50 years.

All too often, I fear, oversight is a bit like the weather: all of us talk about it, but too few of us do anything about it. It was in the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 that we first committed the Congress to the duty of maintaining "continuous watchfulness" over agencies and programs within the purview of our committees. Since then, we have reaffirmed our commitment to this critical function on numerous occasions. Oversight objectives are published, and oversight and investigation subcommittees have been established. Many of us devote much time and energy to reviewing the statutes and programs we have helped bring into being; but few of us, I daresay, are satisfied that we fulfill the "continuous watchfulness" which is expected of us.

Mr. Speaker, we and our staffs have a unique opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to the oversight function, and to obtain information and exchange information and refine our skills. An oversight workshop, consisting of three morning sessions, is being planned for Members and staff on February 14 to 16, during the Lincoln-Washington district work period. The workshop has been designed by the Congressional Research Service in cooperation with House and Senate committee staff. It continues a tradition begun in 1978, when the first such workshop was held. As before, the workshop is sponsored and endorsed by the joint leadership.

Workshop speakers and roundtable participants will include former Senators and Representatives, staff experts, executive officials, investigative journalists, and experts commentators. Sessions are scheduled from 9 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. on February 14, 15, and 16 in room 2322 of the Rayburn House Office Building. I urge Members to attend one or more of these sessions if at all possible, but in any case to urge their staff members to attend.●

OLYMPIC COIN PROGRAM TOPS $30 MILLION MARK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to announce that donations to U.S. Olympic athletes from the sale of Olympic commemorative coins have passed the $30 million mark. By the end of January, the U.S. Mint had turned over nearly $32 million to the U.S. Olympic Committee and the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee.

As chairman of the House Consumer Affairs and Coinage Subcommittee and the sponsor of the legislation providing for this Olympic coin program, I am particularly proud to see the Congress, the U.S. Mint, and the U.S. Treasury working together for this very worthy purpose. I see no reason why sales of the coins cannot raise $100 million before the end of the year.

As the world prepares to watch the winter Olympic games in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, beginning this evening, it is with appreciation for all our U.S. athletes that I call attention to the merits of my Olympic coin plan which Congress adopted in July 1982. That plan has provided our athletes with much needed financial support and will continue to do so in the future.

The U.S. Mint is currently offering three coins: A 1983 silver dollar, a 1984 silver dollar, and a 1984 $10 gold piece. Ten dollars from the sale of each silver coin and $50 from the sale of each gold coin are split equally between the U.S. Olympic Committee and the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee.

The motto for my bill was "All the Money to the Athletes," and this program has fulfilled that purpose. When Congress originally debated the Olympic coin program, the arguments were centered around two plans. One plan had the U.S. Government mint 17 different coins, and then turn them over to a private marketing firm which would sell the coins and turn some of the profits over to the United States and Los Angeles Olympic Committees.

The private coin deal would have guaranteed the Olympics $30 million. Most coin experts have said that the guaranty was all the money that would have been turned over to the Olympics. Glowing forecasts for privately handled past programs in other countries had fallen far short of expectations, and there was no reason to think that a 1984 program would be any different. Many argued that under the private plan, most of the profit would have gone to the private companies before any profit would have gone to the athletes.

I am greatly pleased that Congress adopted my plan because, truly, the U.S. athletes are benefiting directly from it. Instead of receiving $30 million as a total sum, U.S. Olympic athletes have received $30 million as a token of what is to come. This program is not only a success when compared to the private plan, but the money raised so far is also the largest amount in history ever turned over to an Olympic group by any coin program.

Additionally, I would like to highlight the vital role coin collectors have played in making this program a success. Nearly 95 percent of the money we have received for the coins has come from coin collector's contributions. I applaud their efforts in supporting this program.

Our coin program has been a resounding success, and I wish all our Olympic athletes well in Sarajevo this winter and in Los Angeles this summer.●

FEDERAL CHARTER FOR VIETNAM VETERANS OF AMERICA, INC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would recognize and grant a Federal charter to the Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc. My distinguished colleague, Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT, the ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and other members of the committee and the House, have joined with me in cosponsoring this legislation. A Federal charter will simply recognize the VVA's commitment to Vietnam servicemen, a commitment that began in the Armed Forces of the United States during the most prolonged and controversial conflict in which this country has ever been embroiled.

Society has often found it difficult to come to grips with the difficult personal sacrifices these men and women made. But whether you were for or against our involvement in Vietnam does not matter now. What does matter are the men and women who were willing to do what their country asked when their country asked them to do it. It is time to pull those unpleasant shreds of history from the corners of our subconscious where we have tucked them away, and recognize the outstanding men and women who experienced the coldness of this conflict.

Granting the Vietnam Veterans of America a Federal charter is a fitting and appropriate way to say we appreciate the service members of this organization rendered our Nation in a time of crisis.

I hope an early hearing is scheduled on the bill, and I urge my colleagues to join with us in cosponsoring this legislation.●

SENATE—Tuesday, February 7, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday February 6, 1984)

The Senate met at 10:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Our prayer this morning will be offered by His Eminence, Archbishop Iakovos, primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America. He is sponsored by Senator PAUL SARBANES, from the State of Maryland.

PRAYER

His Eminence, Archbishop Iakovos, primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, New York, N.Y., offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit now and ever unto the ages of ages, Amen.

As we begin our day and its incumbent preoccupations, we reverently bend our heads before Thee, O God, the fountainhead of our strength and wisdom, and we beseech Thee to ever inspire, guide, and sustain us.

We thank Thee for allowing us to study and think over the problems which daily confront our people, here and abroad. We have no other stronger desire but to be the instrument of Thy divine providence and will.

We bless Thy name, which is above every name, and it is Thy name, to which we have our recourse, whenever we attempt to discover the reasons that divide peoples against peoples and nations against nations.

We gather in Your name even today, and we implore Thee to guide us as we endeavor to fulfill Thy commandment to love one another. Enable us, to enable our Nation to maintain her leadership of the free world and to explore the potential to further understanding, reconciliation, and peace.

This we ask from Thee, who assured us that blessed is the nation, whose ruler and protector and defender is You and You alone. Amen!

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

TRIBUTE TO ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, we are pleased to welcome to lead us in prayer His Eminence, Archbishop Iakovos, the primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, for the past 25 years.

I yield 1 minute of my time to the distingushed Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the acting majority leader.

ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS' 25 YEARS OF LEADERSHIP

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, we are especially pleased and honored to have His Eminence, Archbishop Iakovos, primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, deliver the opening prayer this morning.

For 25 years, longer than any other Greek Orthodox Archbiship, His Eminence has provided the Archdiocese with a sure spiritual compass and distinguished leadership. He has guided more than 2 million communicants in over 500 parishes in the United States, Canada, Central and South America through the difficult times of profound challenge and change over the past quarter century.

In the years since he became Archbishop in 1959, America was involved in a period of deep social and economic change—a war divided the Nation and even families; the civil rights movement challenged our people; and international events, especially those in Greece, Cyprus, and Turkey have brought great pain and suffering to the Orthodox Church and the Archbishop.

In the great tradition of the church, Archbishop Iakovos has spoken out fearlessly on the moral and religious issues of the day. He fought racial segregation and marched beside the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., in Selma. He has led efforts to end the prosecution of the ecumenical patriarchate and he has spoken out strongly for human rights.

Archbishop Iakovos is an acknowledged world leader in the ecumenical movement and the quest for Christian unity and understanding among all religious people.

His leadership in bringing together men and women of good will in love and understanding has brought renewed vitality and unity to the Greek Orthodox archdiocese and to the religious life of our Nation and the world.

Devout, brilliant, articulate, commanding in speech and manner, yet a humble servant of the Lord, Archbishop Iakovos is looked upon with deep respect and pride by his followers as a man of the cloth imbued with the vision, dignity, humility, and strength, which only God can impart.

We are honored to have Archbishop Iakovos here with us today to deliver the opening prayer, and we look forward to many more years of his spiritual guidance and moral leadership.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that some brief biographical material about His Eminence be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIS EMINENCE, ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS

His Eminence Archbishop Iakovos, Prelate of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America, is a leading figure in the world-wide movement toward the unity of all Christian Denominations. He has been the spiritual leader of more than two million communicants since 1959, as Exarch of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople. He served as Co-President of the World Council of Churches for eight years, and is in close contact with all the Christian Denominations beside his own, that make up this international body.

Archbishop Iakovos was born Demetrios A. Coucouzis on the Turkish Island of Imbruz on July 29, 1911, the son of Maria and Athanasios Coucouzis. At the age of sixteen he realized his ambition to enter the Halki Theological School on the Island of Halki, in Turkey. He was graduated with high honors in 1934. Father Demetrios came to the United States as archdeacon of the Archdiocese of North and South America, and professor of the Archdiocese Theological School, then located in Pomfret, Connecticut.

When he was ordained in Boston in 1940, in accordance with Greek Orthodox custom, he took the name of Iakovos. He has served the communities of Hartford, Connecticut, the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity in New York City, Saint Louis, Missouri, and Boston, Massachusetts, where he remained twelve years as dean of the Cathedral of the Annunciation. While there he earned the S.T.M. Degree from Harvard Divinity School in 1945, and served as director and president of the Holy Cross Theological School in Brookline, Massachusetts.

Attaining the highest order of the Orthodox Eastern Clergy, on December 17, 1954. He became Bishop of Melita (Malta) in the Archdiocese of Central and Western Europe. In March 1955, he was appointed representative of the Greek Church's Ecumenical Patriarchate at the World Council of Churches Headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland. He travelled extensively in this capacity, and attended many ecclesiastical councils. He visited the United States many times lecturing at Harvard and Boston Universities and at many religious conferences. In 1956 he was elected a metropolitan (Bishop of a large city).

The Holy Synod of the Ecumenical Patriarchate elected Iakovos Archbishop of North and South America, on February 14, 1959, to succeed the late Archbishop Michael. Returning to the United States in March 1959, Archbishop Iakovos was enthroned at the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity in New York City.

The Archdiocese is the largest of the Orthodox Eastern bodies in the Americas, and has about two million communicants in five hundred churches in the United States. Additional adherents live in Canada and South America.

His Eminence is known internationally as the leading proponent of the ecumenical movement. As a personal representative in international ecumenical meetings and seminars, he was a member of the delegation which accompanied Patriarch Athenagoras I to Jerusalem for a historical meeting with Pope Paul VI in 1964. He attended the historic ceremonies in Rome which nullified the centuries old "anathema" between the Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox Churches in 1965. When His Eminence called upon Pope John XXIII in the spring of 1959, he became the first Greek Orthodox Bishop to have visited a Pope in over 350 years.

A recipient of numerous honorary doctorate degrees, His Eminence Archbishop Iakovos has written ten books and pamphlets in Greek, French, English and German, and in 1960, he "picked-up" Spanish for a South American tour. He became an American citizen in 1950.

Mr. President, I would like to announce that at 2 o'clock on Thursday, February 9, there will be a Commerce Committee hearing on S. 2160, a bill to establish a National Fisheries Marketing Council. This bill would strengthen the position of the U.S. commercial fishing industry by encouraging domestic consumption of fish through well coordinated fisheries marketing activities. In addition to strengthening the economic position of our domestic commercial fishermen, this bill would educate American consumers about the nutritional and health benefits associated with increased consumption of fish.

Research conducted at Harvard University has indicated that a diet low in cholesterol and high in fish and fish oil may be linked to reduced incidence of coronary artery disease. The health benefits of a low cholesterol diet have been confirmed by the results of a 10-year study recently completed at the National Institute of Health. I bring to the attention of my colleagues two articles appearing in the Sunday, January 29 edition of the Washington Post. Both articles cite the link between high fat, high cholesterol diets and heart and blood vessel disease. Publication of these research results has focused public attention upon the health benefits of proper diet. This heightened public awareness should provide an added boost to the promotion and marketing of domestic seafood as envisioned in the Fisheries Marketing Council legislation.

As a cosponsor of this legislation, Senator HATCH, the chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee has expressed his interest in improving the American diet to reduce the risk of health hazards such as heart attacks, and to help check the alarming increase in national health care costs. In light of the connection between dietary cholesterol and cardiovascular disease, we are very interested in the forthcoming results of an Office of Technology Assessment study requested to examine the relationship between fish oil consumption and human health.

The National Fisheries Marketing Council will generically promote fish and fish products on a national scale. Through education, it will develop the American consumer's confidence in the quality and nutritional value of domestic fish products. Our fisheries development foundations have already done much to market domestic seafood on a regional basis. I commend the marketing efforts of these foundations. However, no regional entity can speak with a unified voice for the entire American seafood industry, and a fragmented marketing program for domestic fish products is inadequate to compete with well-subsidized, well-organized foreign fishing fleets. Through the establishment of a National Fisheries Marketing Council, we can effectively supplement and coordinate the regional marketing efforts now in place. We intend to fund the Council with foreign fishing fees during the first several years, with industry assessments eventually paying for the continuation of the Council.

Mr. President, this legislation will enhance the competitive position of the American seafood industry, and provide health benefits to America through wide consumer acceptance of fish and fish products. I ask unanimous consent that two recent articles in the Washington Post on cholesterol and the diet be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINKING DIET, HEART AND HEALTH

(By Victor Cohn)

So now cholesterol is real. Government scientists have said so. They have told us that a 10-year study of nearly 4,000 men at 12 major medical centers has furnished "the first conclusive evidence" that lowering blood cholesterol, whether by diet or a drug, can help prevent heart attacks. As a result of the National Institutes of Health's Coronary Primary Prevention Trial:

The American Heart Association is pressing its "prudent diet" message to young and old. It says, shun solid fats, shun cholesterol-rich foods, live longer.

NIH's National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute has begun planning "a vigorous national educational campaign" to tell people to see a doctor and get their blood cholesterol measured—and if the cholesterol level is too high, move toward that prudent diet.

The meat and dairy industries, purveyors of a number of high-fat and therefore cholesterol-raising products, while understandably unenthusiastic about low-fat diets, point out that they sell low-fat products, too.

A doctor, undoubtedly one of thousands like him, says he will become "more aggressive" in advising patients to adopt low-fat, low-cholesterol diets to lengthen life.

No medical subject could be more important than cholesterol and its relation to health. Heart and blood-vessel diseases (the two are closely related) rank as the nation's No. 1 killer. Some 1.5 million Americans will suffer heart attacks this year, and a half a million of them will die.

The causes of heart attacks are often what scientists call "mutifactorial," meaning there may be more then one. Smoking is a major cause of heart disease. So is hypertension or high blood pressure, which in many susceptible individuals (not everyone) can be tiggered by consuming too much salt. And some people may inherit a tendency to have early heart attacks.

But "almost everyone," most specialists are now saying, can benefit from a lower-fat, low-cholesterol diet. This includes most of those with a hereditary problem.

Cholesterol is a thick, waxy substance made in the body itself. It is part of the structural material of blood cells. It is also one of the constituents of bile, which the liver makes to break up fats.

The rub, apparently, is that when we eat too much of some kinds of fats, or consume too much cholesterol in our food, the body's cholesterol-making apparatus goes out of control and starts pouring out too much cholesterol, which builds up on artery walls and gradually chokes off blood flow.

When the flow that is choked off is the blood flow to the heart, the result is heart disease, either slow degeneration of a swift, sudden attack.

More than three decades ago scientists began to notice that nations with a diet high in saturated fats (dairy fats and more or less hard fats, like meat fats and solidified oils) generally had high blood-cholesterol levels and high heart-attack rates. Nations with low fat consumption generally had low average cholesterol levels and fewer heart attacks.

When low-cholesterol peoples such as the Japanese moved to a high-cholesterol culture such as the United States', they ate fattier diets and began having heart attacks.

These observations launched many scientific trials of low-fat diets to prevent heart attacks. The results were generally inconclusive. A "definitive" trial would have to involve so many thousands of families on varying diets for so many years that it would be virtually impossible to conduct—and probably would cost more than $1 billion, more than any government health agency has any hope of corralling.

This impasse prompted the government heart institute to finance the $150 million trial just completed, one in which 3,086 men with high blood-cholesterol readings were divided into two groups. One group was placed on a moderate anti-cholesterol diet, the other on both the diet and cholestyramine, a cholesterol-lowering prescription drug. (So many people have become fat-and-cholesterol-conscious and are modifying their diets on their own that both groups had to be given the same diet to keep them comparable.)

After 7½ to 10 years' observation, the drug group had lower blood cholesterol levels and had suffered 19 percent fewer non-fatal heart attacks and 24 percent fewer fatal attacks than the non-drug group.

According to government and academic doctors who conducted the study, this was "the first truly solid evidence" that lowering cholesterol truly prevents heart attacks. The important point is that the group with lower cholesterol had fewer heart attacks, not that a drug did the job. This therefore provides "strong reinforcement" for the view that the public in general can benefit by moving toward lowering cholesterol by an anti-cholesterol diet, which means a diet lower in fatty red meats, bacon, sausages, the yolks of eggs and high-butterfat dairy products (and the use instead of some vegetable oils that tend to lower blood cholesterol). Some persons, not most, may need a drug too.

Some fibers (like oatmeal, apples, carrots and soybeans or bean curd or tofu) also help lower blood cholesterol. Moderate use of alcohol, a modest drink or two or glass of wine or two daily, may also help prevent heart attacks. Regular exercise may increase the proportion of one cholesterol fraction (HDE or high-density lipoprotein) that actually helps prevent heart disease.

Some doctors, scientists and others almost certainly will quarrel with these dietary views.

Dr. George Wilson, vice president for scientific affairs of the American Meat Institute, says "the study results do not draw any dietary recommendations for the general public." A National Dairy Council spokesman says "the general population does not necessarily have a cholesterol risk factor."

Yet Wilson also says that meat producers have taken "major steps" to provide leaner meats, and the dairy group says "we have low-fat products as well as whole milk products."

Dr. Antonio Gotto of Baylor University, president of the American Heart Association, has no doubts, saying:

"The American Heart Association has for many years recommended to the American population, both those who are healthy and well and those who have a heart and blood vessel disease, a diet aimed at lowering their cholesterol levels . . . The key message from the study is that . . . if all Americans would reduce their blood cholesterol levels by 25 per cent this would eventually lead to a 50 per cent reduction in the incidence of coronary heart disease."

The government's heart institute is not ready to say that "everyone" should move to a cholesterol-lowering diet. It will, its officials say, start a public education campaign to alert all Americans to the importance of cholesterol. It will begin consulting experts to "begin to form a consensus" on a recommendation for everyone. And it will certainly bless immediate dietary change for persons whose doctors tell them their cholesterol level is too high.

What is "too high"? The average adult American blood cholesterol level is 215 to 220 milligrams of cholesterol per deciliter of blood. Dr. John La Rosa of George Washington University, a practicing doctor as well as a scientific investigator, says he will become "much more aggressive" in urging diet change on anyone with a cholesterol reading over 210.

Dr. Ernst Wynder, president of the American Health Foundation, says, "I think if we want to have a lower heart disease rate we should aim at cholesterol levels of about 180."

Trying to achieve 180 would mean some dietary change for three-quarters of the American population.

Will Americans move in this direction? They have been doing so for the past 20 years, says Dr. Gotto, and this has helped reduce the nation's horrendous heart attack rate.

The governing council of the American Medical Association agreed last October that "there is good reason to believe that average cholesterol levels . . . may be higher than the optimum due in part to the typical U.S. diet."

We may indeed need to modify our diet says Dr. Harold Lubin, the AMA's director of food and nutrition. But he also adds a caveat: "I don't think we want people to feel they're going to die if they don't do something drastic. We don't want people to feel they can't ever eat things they like. They can. They just need to become more concerned and pick their foods in a more balanced way."

Dr. Basil Rifkind, the National Heart Institute's study director, says of the kind of prudent diet that seems to make sense; "It's not a really restrictive diet. It just says put more emphasis on vegetable fats and less on animal fats. It's not all or nothing, and it doesn't say, 'Make yourself hungry.'"

THE LIVING PROOF: THERE IS LIFE AFTER BUTTER, EGGS AND BEEF

(By Carole Sugarman)

In retrospect, says Ted Feuerbach, life without butter is easy. Ten years ago, though, he was following a virtual dairycase diet. Seven or eight eggs a week. Three glasses of whole milk a day. Chocolate ice cream for dessert. Cheese before bed.

Then in 1974, after a routine medical check-up, he was told the news: his blood cholesterol count was high. Very high. Feuerbach had to adapt.

Now the 68-year-old retired aeronautics engineer (who does 90 percent of the cooking in his Arlington household while his 64-year-old wife Eileen attends college) has a refrigerator that looks like a low-cholesterol showcase. Stockpiles of margarine packages, containers of low-fat yogurt and cottage cheese, a mayonnaise jar that has stayed full for weeks.

Feuerbach didn't lose his enthusiasm about food, nor did he switch to a dull and deprived eating regimen. In adapting, Feuerbach learned that stubborn taste buds can be retrained, that lifelong habits can be reversed—and turned into new ones.

But it took time, and he had help. A week after he was informed of his blood-test results. Feuerbach heard about the cholesterol research being done by the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute. He applied to be a candidate.

The objective of the study was to find out if lowering blood cholesterol would lead to lower risk of heart attack. George Washington University's Lipid Research Clinic was one of the 12 medical centers around the country NIH financed for the study, and after extensive questions and tests, Feuerbach became one of 236 test subjects chosen by GW.

During the 7½ years he participated in the study, Feuerbach was advised to follow a diet of "moderation," which limited his intake of fat and cholesterol, but was not as restrictive as the current American Heart Association recommendations. He was told not to keep a daily log of what he ate; program leaders wanted to insure that participants were adapting "naturally." "He made the type of changes that the general public could be making," said Anne Molofsky, a nutritionist who did dietary counseling for the study.

Every two months, when Feuerbach went to GW to have his blood cholesterol count taken (never knowing the results), he filled out a form estimating what he ate the previous week—including how many eggs, how much meat, dairy products, margarine, oil. He would see a doctor, a nurse and a nutritionist.

If anything, Feuerbach developed more interest in cooking. He enrolled in cooking classes at Arlington adult school, started sending recipes to GW for the clinic's handouts, and when he went for his check-ups, he'd bring the doctors and nurses samples of his efforts—such as homemade pickles made from cucumbers in his garden.

Feuerbach eased into food changes slowly. From eight eggs a week, he gradually reduced to three—in about three months. When he switched from butter to margarine, he would use only a little at first, to get used to the taste. Dietary adaption was not new for Feuerbach. About 30 years ago, he used two teaspoons of sugar in his coffee. Every morning, his wife would put less and less sugar in his drink until after several months, unbeknownst to him he was drinking it with no sugar. Coffee (decaffeinated now) with sugar "tastes like candy" to him.

He conducted his own taste tests. Even though the diet called for low-fat milk and margarine instead of butter, he still had flexibility. After tasting and cooking with various brands of margarine, Feuerbach found one that "didn't smell" during frying. Similiarly, in switching from whole milk to a less fatty milk, he started from skim and worked his way up the fat percentage scale. Now Feuerbach prefers skim for drinking and has settled on 2 percent for cereal. Whole milk now "tastes like cream" to him.

He changed the way the food was cooked, without eliminating the food. For soups and casseroles that contain meat or poultry, Feuerbach cooks them the night before, isolates the meat and refrigerates it separately. The next day, the fat is skimmed off-the top of the casserole and the meat is returned.

Gravies are made from meat juices, not fat. And fried chicken is oven baked: skinned, coated with flour, salt, pepper and curry powder and baked with about ¼ cup of melted margarine in the bottom of the pan.

Feuerbach made substitutions. He used to think that "nothing else" went with baked potatoes except sour cream. Now he used plain yogurt. Instead of pork chops, he uses pork tenderloin.

He adapted old recipes. The heavy cream in creamed spinach became low-fat milk and margarine, skim milk and margarine found their way into once-rich creamed eggs in curry sauce.

He made trade-offs. For example, if he ate macaroni and cheese for dinner (a favorite), he'd eliminate other cheese that day.

And for some foods, he made totally new habits. Two-egg breakfasts were transformed into hot or cold cereal, or low-fat yogurt with fruit. Luncheon meats were replaced with tuna or salmon.

Feuerbach was recently unblinded about his results. During the study, all of the participants had been following a recommended diet. In addition, half of them had been given a cholesterol-lowering drug, the other half were given a placebo. Feuerbach was in the drug group. After 7½ years, his blood cholesterol was lowered by 18 percent, and his risk of heart attack reduced by almost 40 percent.

As his cholesterol lowering was due to a combination of diet and drug, said Molofsky, the specific benefit that Feuerbach derived from the diet is not known because of the powerful effect of the drug. But according to Molofsky, approximately 95 percent of the population who find themselves with high cholesterol do not need a drug. They can reduce their cholesterol to a normal level simply by following the American Heart Association diet. As for those with normal cholesterol levels, said Molofsky, "it [the AHA diet] is a basic, good, healthy diet for anyone."

Here are some of Feuerbach's recipes, along with those from "Modified Magic," a cookbook compiled by the 12 clinics participating in the study:

TED FEUERBACH'S SALMON MOUSSE

(Makes 1 quart)

15½-ounce can red salmon
2¼-ounce packages gelatin
½ cup boiling water
Juice of 1 lemon
1 cup mayonnaise (preferably low-fat)
1 cup evaporated milk
1 teaspoon dill
1 teaspoon paprika

Drain salmon, reserving liquid. Soften gelatin in liquid drained from salmon and dissolve in boiling water. Add lemon juice and blend in blender with salmon until smooth. Add mayonnaise, milk, dill and paprika. Blend thoroughly and pour into a 1-quart mold. Refrigerate until set.

REPRESENTATIVE BARBER CONABLE ANNOUNCES RETIREMENT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on yesterday one of our most distinguished colleagues in the other body, BARBER CONABLE of New York, announced that he will retire from the House at the conclusion of his current term.

I received this news with regret, since the Congress will be losing one of its finest Members, but also with admiration for his decision to regain his "amateur" status in politics.

At the end of this session, Mr. CONABLE will have been in the Congress for 20 years. As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means for 18 of those years, he has had an enormously constructive and moderating influence on the tax policy of the United States, and his passion for moderation has extended to other important fields of public policy as well.

But Congressman CONABLE said yesterday that he remembered telling his family 20 years ago that he would not become a professional politician, and that after two decades in Washington, his amateur status is in some doubt.

I will refrain from preaching my citizen legislature sermon yet again, Mr. President, but I must say that BARBER CONABLE is a splendid example of a citizen who can do important work here and important work elsewhere with equal skill and zeal.

I should also note that Mr. CONABLE's heir apparent as ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee is a distinguished Tennessean, JOHN DUNCAN of Knoxville. Congressman DUNCAN and I have been friends since boyhood, and I know him to be a man of great integrity and considerable legislative talent.

I wish both these good men success, and I know my colleagues join me in that wish. And most especially do we commend BARBER CONABLE for his exemplary service to the Congress, to the State of New York, and to the Nation.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the leadership time on both sides be reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the two remaining special orders be postponed temporarily. We will announce later what time of the day they will be permitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the period for the transaction of routine morning business commence now and continue until the hour of 11:30 a.m., and that Senators may be permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

FUNDING OF AMERICA'S HISTORICALLY BLACK COLLEGES

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, our Nation's cultural diversity has long been a source of our Nation's greatness. This has been especially true in the area of higher education. The diversity of our colleges and universities has contributed markedly to America's economic, educational, and cultural well-being.

We have recently learned that one significant element in this rich cultural fabric is in jeopardy. America's historically black colleges and universities are threatened by rising costs and declining enrollments. The institutions which have produced generations of leaders, fostered a sense of identity and community, and met the needs of the economically disadvantaged are now in dire straits.

Mr. President, we must insure the continued vitality of these institutions. In Virginia, Hampton Institute, Norfolk State University, Virginia Union University, St. Paul's College, Virginia State University and Virginia Seminary and College offer exemplary educational opportunities and they must continue to do so.

Congress and the administration have responded to this critical situation. Last year the funding for aid to historically black colleges was increased, and the budget includes comparable amount for fiscal year 1985. I urge my colleagues to respond favorably to this request.

But the fate of historically black colleges must be a concern for us all and I would urge that private contributors support them generously as well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial and a column on this subect be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From USA Today, Feb. 6, 1984]

USA MUST FINANCE OUR BLACK COLLEGES

The school has a great tradition: 120 years of service in educating citizens and developing leaders. Recently, students there slept in frigid dorms as weather dipped below freezing. Fisk University couldn't pay its utility bills.

Fisk and more than 100 traditionally black colleges and universities like it are in deep financial trouble.

In the 30 years since the Supreme Court shattered "legal" barriers of segregation and ordered schools to admit students without regard to race, there has been progress toward integration. But the transition has been traumatic.

No longer are there mobs throwing stones or governors in university doorways barring black students. But many of those students now admitted to previously all-white institutions report feeling isolated and alienated there. Too often these schools are huge, state-supported education factories with many thousands of students and little or no opportunity for individual recognition.

There have been a few, token examples of black students winning leadership roles in student government affairs in such settings. But since such honors inevitably are tied to campus politics, most often they have lost out. Discrimination lives.

They have been made to feel the sting of social rejection and denial. They have formed their own clubs, caucuses, fraternities and sororities in order to gain a sense of social acceptance and participation.

No wonder so many black students, preferring to avoid the heartache and hassle, enroll in traditionally all-black schools. More than 40 percent of four-year degrees awarded black students are earned in those institutions.

But these black schools are losing students and faculty to formerly segregated, all-white schools. And, they have lost sources of funding, the life's blood of higher education.

From slavery to the end of segregated education, they have served to provide the only place most blacks could learn or encounter a leadership experience. These schools never "practiced" segregation and don't now. It was enforced on them by Jim Crow laws and now is a matter of student preference—white as well as black.

It is snide and snobbish to suggest that they survived these last three decades because of sentimentality or guilt.

They still educate far too many students to be allowed to die. The nation still needs them. They deserve financial support, whatever its source. They deserve a truly fair share of private funding and the public grants and entitlements that go to schools with majority white enrollments.

At a time when we are still trying to learn how to fully educate all of our young, it would be stupid and short-sighted to abandon valuable institutions that can teach us all.

BLACK COLLEGES HAVE TO SURVIVE

(By Jay T. Harris)

WASHINGTON.—For several years now, some of the nation's leading black educators—people like Eli Blake, president of Clark College in Atlanta, and Walter Leonard, the president of Fisk University in Nashville—have been sounding the alarm: "Black colleges are in trouble!"

But few have listened. The result: Fisk, one of the premier black colleges, was recently traumatized by its financial woes. Others continue to be threatened.

This trend must be reversed. Black colleges must be saved and rejuvenated.

The current problems of these schools began in the mid-1960s, when the widespread integration of higher education began. Many of the best faculty and brightest students at black colleges were lured to white colleges by offers of fat salaries and full scholarships.

Out of the euphoria that welled up in the hearts and minds of many Americans as the barriers of segregation fell, a belief arose that black colleges might no longer be needed. After all, what were these schools but alternatives to the white colleges that were beginning to open their doors?

But black colleges were never mere alternatives to white colleges and can never be replaced by them.

Black colleges are sanctuaries for the history of a race—places where that history can be told with a loving fullness and celebrated without embarrassment or explanation.

Black colleges are safe harbors for black youth—places for them to grow straight and tall, protected for a few crucial years from the disease of American racism.

At a black college a black student's race is at the same time irrelevant and central.

It is irrelevant in that the student is simply that: a student, not a "black student," the norm, not an exception.

It is central in that blackness is the essence of the black experience that black colleges are grounded; it is to the understanding and solution of blacks problems that the best black colleges are dedicated.

Black colleges are vital tools for the defense and development of black America.

In these schools, many of the young men and women who will champion the cause of black Americans in the future will develop that special sense of purpose and possibility that will one day lead to the defense of racism and the triumph of equality in American life.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, do I have some time reserved?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader has 25 minutes reserved.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

THE BUDGET AND BUDGET DEFICITS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on tomorrow morning, Senator DANIEL INOUYE, the Secretary of the Senate Democratic Conference, will represent Senate Democrats at a White House meeting on the deficits. I have asked Senator INOUYE to attend that meeting for the purpose of listening to any deficit reduction proposals which the President may be prepared to recommend and, in turn, to transmit those proposals back to Senate Democrats.

I would like to believe that this meeting will produce a constructive result. But the history of past experience does not encourage me to believe this will necessarily be the case.

It was nearly 2 years ago, in the spring of 1982, that we watched a long and frustrating series of budget meetings conducted by a group of White House representatives and legislators which became known as the Gang of 17. Those meetings had their genesis in the widespread bipartisan dissatisfaction which greeted the budget the President submitted to Congress on February 1, 1982. The growing congressional restlessness over the large deficits in the President's budget broke into the open within weeks, as alternative budget proposals from Members of Congress began to proliferate.

On March 25, 1982, President Reagan announced that he had authorized his Chief of Staff, Mr. James Baker, to sit down and talk with congressional leaders. The group became larger and larger until it reached, as I have indicated, some 17 members, including members of the Budget, Finance, and Appropriations Committees, as well as White House staff. The Senate Budget Committee at first started its markup but then delayed while the talks continued. The discussions continued through April, with the President saying that he would remain on the sidelines until the talks produced something which both sides could agree to. At a White House press conference on March 31, 1982, the President was asked what authority he had given James Baker in the talks. The President responded: "I've authorized Jim to go up and listen and come back and tell me what they're proposing."

We all remember well the culmination of those talks in a flourish of press coverage and a Capitol Hill meeting of the President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

We learned from the Gang of 17 experience that negotiation with administration representatives is no substitute for Presidential leadership on the budget. We learned from the Gang of 17 experience that negotiations are not negotiations when two-thirds of the issues in contention are ruled out of the discussion. We learned from the Gang of 17 experience that secret talks are no substitute for the bipartisan legislative process.

Mr. President, I am concerned that history may be about to repeat itself. Once again, the President has called for bipartisan budget discussions in reaction to broad dissatisfaction with the deficits growing out of his fiscal and economic policies. Once again, the President appears to be on the sidelines. Although the budget meeting has been set for Wednesday, tomorrow, the President will not attend. In fact, he is not even in the city. He is in Las Vegas today giving a speech and then is scheduled to fly to California to begin a 5-day vacation.

When the President called me the day of the State of the Union address this year to ask that I appoint a representative to these talks, I told him that I would do so, and I appointed Senator INOUYE, a Member of the elected leadership, to serve as the emissary of Senate Democrats.

But I also told the President during our telephonic conversation that these talks could not succeed without his personal leadership. I said, "There is only one man in this country who has the forum in which he can speak to all the people and convince them that deficits are dangerous."

After all, a lot of people may not understand that a deficit is a debt.

I also said that there was only one man in this country who had the forum to reach all of the people and who was in a position to persuade the American people that to bring the deficits under control and reverse the trend would require some bitter medicine, perhaps.

I said, "I can talk to a few, but I cannot talk to everyone. Only the President can do that." I said, "Mr. President, you need to get out there and lead this effort, because only then will the American people be made fully aware of the dangers of the deficits and only then will they be persuaded to swallow whatever bitter medicine must be taken."

So he said, "OK, if you would designate someone, then I will do the other part." So I appointed Mr. INOUYE.

I do not believe that talks between members of the administration and Members of Congress such as were planned can substitute for personal Presidential leadership on this very difficult issue. The administration has been at work on its own budget, which was submitted to Congress last week. And the development of the budget requires months and months and months and months. The administration has had months and months and months and months as does any other administration in the future or as has any other administration in the past.

This budget was submitted to Congress only last week. Even before that, we saw this effort to bring congressional representatives and representatives of the administration together to work out some neat little package for reducing the budget. Apparently the hope was that this could all be done in a matter of a very few days. But it requires more than a few days to realistically deal with the budget and the budget deficits.

I had hoped and expected that the President would use his budget to lay out a blueprint for getting these deficits under control. But I regret that the President has ignored his own best opportunity to cut the deficit—namely, in his own budget.

The administration, as I say, has had months, but it has failed to produce an acceptable budget. How, then, can anyone realistically expect the whole budget to be rewritten by a few Members of Congress and administration representatives meeting downtown, whether at the White House or the Blair House or wherever? The fact of the matter is the process of crafting a budget requires weeks and weeks of careful preparation.

The Congressional Budget Office must have an opportunity to review the President's budget proposals and estimate their budgetary impact so that everyone is working from the same set of numbers. Hearings must be held by various committees to receive the views of the administration and the affected parties. Witnesses have to be called. A record is kept of those hearings. The appropriate committee or committees then meet and go over the hearings and mark up the legislation. Now, that cannot be done down at the White House or the Blair House. Those necessary hearings have to take place up here if we are going to work through the legislative process. And that is the way this matter has to be dealt with.

So it is after hearings are held and the testimony of expert witnesses on the part of the administration is entered into the record, only then can the difficult process of putting together a legislative measure really begin.

Mr. President, I think it is unrealistic to believe that a small group of public officials, meeting behind closed doors and without the testimony of administration witnesses on the record, with questions asked, I do not think an acceptable budget can be produced in such a process, certainly not in a matter of days. There is no substitute for the open debate of our bipartisan legislative system—a system that has served us well for many years and I hope that it will continue to serve us well.

The President said in his economic report that he will wait until 1985 to submit his plan for a balanced budget. This lack of leadership does not bode well for serious deficit reduction this year.

The budget which he submitted to Congress only last Wednesday is woefully inadequate. It would leave us with deficits in the $180 billion range for the next 3 years. It is constructed upon highly unrealistic economic assumptions, which even David Stockman and the President's Chief Economic Adviser Martin Feldstein openly admit cannot be achieved without further deficit reductions yet to be proposed. It uses an artificially inflated baseline for defense, with the result that a $35 billion increase in defense spending is characterized by the administration as a $12.2 billion cut.

During the testimony before the Senate Budget Committee—the Senate Budget Committee is proceeding with its work—OMB Director David Stockman was frank to admit that the President's budget was "unpalatable," that its outyear deficit projections and economic forecasts would not be realized without a radical change in course, and that the President's budget does not contain any such plan for redirecting fiscal policy.

In fact, he went so far as to say that, "We are in the same position that many companies are when they are on the eve of chapter 11" bankruptcy proceedings. So the President's budget policy, I would say, based on Mr. Stockman's words, is bankrupt.

Martin Feldstein, the much beleagured Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, has been similarly frank—and for his honest advice he has been severely criticized in public by members of the administration and, most recently, muzzled. Treasury Secretary Regan went so far last week in discussing the President's "Economic Report," prepared under Feldstein's direction, as to say, "You can throw it away."

So given the dissension among the administration's ranks over his budget and economic report, and given the use of unrealistic assumptions which once again characterize this budget, and given the "secret plan," as I would call it—alluded to in the "Economic Report" in the first few pages, which were signed at the end by President Reagan—given the secret plan for a postelection budget, the next step in the budget process should be a revision and resubmission of the President's 1985 budget.

Mr. President, I want to insert into the RECORD some editorials. The first one is dated February 2, 1984, and appeared in the New York Times. It is entitled, "A Budget of Politics and Pretense." I read but a few excerpts:

What President Reagan calls his fiscal 1985 budget is more like a sales pitch, a campaign speech. He claims economic achievement that isn't his.

Another excerpt:

To judge by his budget message, it's a point of pride to the President that the total spent for all other purposes, including the sick and hungry, would shrink.

Another excerpt:

But incredibly, he offered no substantial plan for relief. The most his lieutenants will grant, grudgingly, is wait till next year.

All Mr. Reagan offers this year is to brand his critics as "doomsayers" and to negotiate with Congress for a three-year, $100 billion "down payment" on deficit reduction. But even if that could be negotiated—

And I stress that—

The deficit in the same three years would still be almost $450 billion, according to Administration figures, or more than $550 billion, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Another excerpt:

As it stands, the Reagan budget involves small cuts in domestic spending, closing some tax loopholes to produce a modest increase in revenues and another big plum for defense. The deficit for 1985 alone is estimated at $180 billion and even that's optimistic. Budget Director David Stockman acknowledged yesterday that it "could easily be above $200 billion."

The last paragraph reads:

That isn't the careful budget of a man who wants to cut spending. It's the political patchwork of a man who wants to be reelected, at any cost.

Those are excerpts from the New York Times article of February 2.

On the same day, February 2, 1984, the Washington Post had an editorial entitled "The Split-Level Budget." I shall read just a few excerpts therefrom.

President Reagan's fourth budget is an uncertain straddle between two awkward realities. The first is that the administration's original budget strategy has collapsed, leaving the country with deficits that even the White House concedes to be intolerable.

Another excerpt reads:

The budget projections assume that interest rates will decline smoothly and steadily to the end of the decade, while they also assume continued fast growth and large deficits. For the attentive reader, the budget document explicitly notes the inconsistency—and it's not a minor one.

Finally, the editorial states in the last paragraph:

A president's budget is an opportunity to set out his program and to educate the country in the requirements of running a strong and stable economy. By either standard, Mr. Reagan's budget fails.

On February 6, 1984, the Washington Post presented another editorial. It is entitled. "The Budget That Wasn't." It speaks about the negotiations. I will read the last paragraph.

But perhaps Mr. Reagan has had a true change of heart since Sen. Dole's last unanswered invitation. Perhaps he really does want genuine negotiations now with Congress. If that is the case, those negotiations will have to start with a presidential proposal and a presidential position. Mr. Reagan will have to come up with a presidential budget that he is prepared to stand behind. On the central issue of American domestic policy, he will have to start behaving like a president.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these three editorials appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 2, 1984]

A BUDGET OF POLITICS AND PRETENSE

What President Reagan calls his fiscal 1985 budget is more like a sales pitch, a campaign speech. He claims economic achievement that isn't his. He promises unprecedented prosperity despite deficits that threaten to destroy it. And he evidently hopes that not many people will catch on, or care, before Election Day.

The budget proposes spending $925 billion in the 12 months beginning next October, much of it from past appropriations, and asks Congress to authorize spending more than $1 trillion in that period and beyond. Four categories account for almost all the increase in authorizations: defense, Social Security and Medicare, farm programs and soaring interest payments.

To judge by his budget message, it's a point of pride to the President that the total spent for all other purposes, including the sick and hungry, would shrink.

The President contends that the healthy upswing in the economy is all his doing. He's not so quick to associate himself with bad news. Yes, the drop in unemployment in the past year was the sharpest in three decades. But in the Reagan Administration, unemployment rose to its highest levels in four decades. Such selective association is understandable, especially in an election year. But it's wrong.

To his credit, the President does not heap blame on the Federal Reserve. Indeed, he explicitly endorses its "sound" policies. Those policies did much more than he did to start, prolong and finally end the recession. Mr. Reagan's contribution, which he doesn't claim, was to create the immense gap between what Washington takes in and what it spends—thanks in large part to his tax cuts and defense spending.

The Reagan deficits have surely produced an economic stimulus, but not the "supply-side" stimulus he advertised on taking office. Now, even if the economy should grow steadily for the next five years, as the Administration blithely predicts, that won't cure the deficit problem.

Yesterday's message concedes, ever so tersely, that "indefinitely prolonged high budget deficits" are a threat because they raise the specter of sharply higher interest rates. That's what businessmen, economists, politicians—and some of his own advisers—have been telling the President for months. But incredibly, he offers no substantial plan for relief. The most his lieutenants will grant, grudgingly, is wait till next year.

All Mr. Reagan offers this year is to brand his critics as "doomsayers" and to negotiate with Congress for a three-year, $100 billion "down payment" on deficit reduction. But even if that could be negotiated, the deficit in the same three years would still be almost $450 billion, according to Administration figures, or more than $550 billion, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

As it stands, the Reagan budget involves small cuts in domestic spending, closing some tax loopholes to produce a modest increase in revenues and another big plum for defense. The deficit for 1985 alone is estimated at $180 billion and even that's optimistic. Budget Director David Stockman acknowledged yesterday that it "could easily be above $200 billion."

That isn't the careful budget of a man who wants to cut spending. It's the political patchwork of a man who wants to be reelected, at any cost.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1984]

THE SPLIT-LEVEL BUDGET

President Reagan's fourth budget is an uncertain straddle between two awkward realities. The first is that the administration's original budget strategy has collapsed, leaving the country with deficits that even the White House concedes to be intolerable. But, simultaneously, Mr. Reagan is running for reelection as the man who, by cutting your taxes, got the economy spinning again.

That puts the administration in the position of arguing that things have gone sufficiently awry to require a large and painful remedy quite soon—but, on the other hand, everything is fine. It makes both cases throughout the budget, in alternating passages. The two arguments are, of course, addressed to two quite different audiences. A lot of people simply note with relief the economy's improvement over the past year and tune out all those quarrelsome professors. But there's also a group of listeners—mostly bankers and investors, the people who collectively set interest rates—that is becoming increasing apprehensive at the thought of at least three years of $200 billion-a-year deficits.

Mr. Reagan himself mainly sings the Sunshine Song. As he poetically puts it in his budget message, "The long winter of transition from the misguided policies of the past, with their inflationary and growth-deadening side effects, is now yielding to a new springtime of hope for America." Any revenue increases are to be strictly limited. He relies instead, he says, on big spending cuts. But there aren't any in this budget. And there won't be any. Other people in the administration—such as his budget director, David Stockman, and his chief economist, Martin Feldstein—join dutifully in the chorus of the Sunshine Song, but attempt to convey by hints, winks and hand signals a sense that at a more propitious time, a year from now, certain unpleasant necessities will naturally have to be addressed.

The budget projections assume that interest rates will decline smoothly and steadily to the end of the decade, while they also assume continued fast growth and large deficits. For the attentive reader, the budget document explicitly notes the inconsistency—and it's not a minor one.

The American economy is now in a state of deep instability. No one ever doubted that inflation could be reduced by a long recession pushing unemployment over 10 percent. Nor did anyone ever doubt that the recession could be ended by a wildly stimulative super-Keynesian budget deficit such as the current one. With the combination of shrewdness and phenomenally good luck that has characterized this administration, it is opening its reelection campaign at the point at which the first effects of deficit-driven growth are visible in falling unemployment and the glow of good feeling. But the second effects—on interest rates and inflation—have not yet arrived. The White House is betting that they won't before the end of the summer. Perhaps it's a good bet.

A president's budget is an opportunity to set out his program and to educate the country in the requirements of running a strong and stable economy. By either standard, Mr. Reagan's budget fails.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 6, 1984]

THE BUDGET THAT WASN'T

The more carefully you look at President Reagan's budget performance, the more peculiar it gets. He has sent to Congress a budget that neither he nor anyone in his administration is willing to support. His budget director acknowledges fundamental inconsistencies, and his economic adviser assures Congress that it has no relationship to the administration's purposes: "The budget is not what we want to see happen. . ."

What do they want? A smaller deficit, they say. How? Here you get suggestions of spending cuts, unspecified. But the budget director, David Stockman, told Fortune Magazine a few weeks ago that there will be no more large spending cuts—and he is certainly right as long as defense remains untouchable. You notice that this budget itself contains no significant spending cuts. The economic adviser, Martin Feldstein, hints that there will obviously have to be a big tax increase after the election. But Mr. Feldstein is leaving that job in a few months, and there is no reason to think that he is speaking for the president.

The White House spokesman heatedly says the president reaffirms the figures as printed in the budget. But which figures? Some assume that the deficit will decline. Others say that it won't. In fact, the president is refusing to make the basic choice. Mr. Stockman incautiously suggests that the White House is waiting to hear the voice of the people in November. But suppose Mr. Reagan wins, and concludes that the voters want neither spending cuts nor tax increases. What then? The administration grins and shrugs.

Mr. Reagan says that he wants Congress to negotiate with him. His secretary of the Treasury, always a reliable indicator of political currents at the White House, chides the Democrats for not responding immediately. But what are they to negotiate on? A budget that the administration has already disavowed?

Mr. Reagan is not doing a president's job. Under American law and custom, the initiative comes from the president. The American government does not work well when the president refuses to lead.

Mr. Reagan has given no one in Congress much reason to believe that he is ready to negotiate in good faith. If he were really looking for a way to begin reducing the deficit and wanted a congressional proposal, he could seize the combination of spending cuts and tax increases drafted by Sen. Robert Dole, who has shown more courage and candor on the budget than all the administration's various quarreling factions put together. Several times over the past year Sen. Dole has called for just such negotiations between the White House and congressional leaders; the White House never responded.

Given that experience, it's hardly unreasonable for Democrats to fear that negotiations now would be merely a trap. They assume that if they were to make any serious proposal, Mr. Reagan would spring up from the table and bound around the country brandishing it as evidence that the Democrats want to raise your taxes and weaken the national defense.

But perhaps Mr. Reagan has had a true change of heart since Sen. Dole's last unanswered invitation. Perhaps he really does want genuine negotiation now with Congress. If that is the case, those negotiations will have to start with a presidential proposal and a presidential position. Mr. Reagan will have to come up with a presidential budget that he is prepared to stand behind. On the central issue of American domestic policy, he will have to start behaving like a president.

ASIAN PACIFIC AMERICAN VOTERS COALITION

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I wish to call my colleagues' attention to the work of the Asian Pacific American Voters Coalition. The Asian Pacific American Voters Coalition, established in October 1983, has successfully accomplished an impressive feat—the formation of a voters coalition representing virtually the entire Asian Pacific community. Composed of 11 national organizations and 7 Washington area groups, the coalition includes among its membership Americans of Chinese, Filipino, Korean, Indian, Thai, and Vietnamese descent.

I commend the primary objective of this nonpartisan group—to promote the active participation of Asian Pacific Americans in local and national elections through voter registration. The coalition will serve a vital function in helping Asian Pacific Americans to cast informed votes through educational programs and community activities.

There are 4 million Asian Pacific Americans in the United States. I am pleased that these citizens, who have made and continue to make valuable contributions to our society, are organizing to increase their active participation in the electoral process. Many members of the coalition or their parents came from countries that do not hold free and fair elections. It is all the more important that they exercise their right as citizens to vote in the United States.

I wish all members of the coalition success in their laudable efforts.

I ask unanimous consent that the list of member organizations of the Asian Pacific American Voters Coalition be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAMILS AND HUMAN RIGHTS IN SRI LANKA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I deplore the acts of violence that have occurred in Sri Lanka over the years between the Sinhalese and Tamil communities. One of the major sources of tensions is the movement for greater autonomy or the formation of a separate state for the Tamils. Inability to resolve this issue peacefully has led to deadly clashes between Tamils and the majority Sinhalese. Last July, communal violence escalated in Sri Lanka to a tragic level that shocked the world. Innocent Tamils were brutally murdered in the streets and some 120,000 Tamils fled or lost their homes during the carnage. Although order was restored, the root cause of the conflict remains. I strongly support nonviolent, democratic efforts to put an end to the tensions among the ethnic groups in Sri Lanka. The government of Sri Lanka must take steps to insure that the terror and violence of July 1983 is not repeated.

The President of Sri Lanka recently proposed a number of steps to address the grievances of the Tamil and other communities in that country. He has convened the All Party Conference at which all legal political parties and religious organizations were represented, including representatives of the Tamil community. The proposals would provide a measure of autonomy for the Tamils and other communities through the establishment of regional council governments headed by the freely elected representatives of the region. The fact that dialog has begun among the parties involved gives hope that solutions can be found to difficult, divisive issues through nonviolent means. It is an encouraging development.

Although these talks are a step in the right direction, I am disturbed by the Sri Lankan Government's continued suspension of important legal safeguards. Its treatment of detainees is cause for deep concern. For example, under Emergency Regulation 15A, the police are permitted to dispose of bodies with inquest procedures. Concerns have been raised that 15A may encourage arbitrary killings by security forces. I appeal to the Sri Lanka Government to rescind this highly suspect regulation, to allow detainees expeditious access to relatives and legal representation, and to require that detainees be brought before a magistrate within 24 hours.

I hope that our Government and my colleagues will join me in urging the Sri Lanka Government to pursue efforts to improve the plight of the Tamils and to respect the basic right of due process of law pertaining to detainees.

A LETTER TO PRESIDENT REAGAN

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have received a copy of a letter sent to President Reagan by Mr. Rubin M. Hanan of Montgomery, Ala., the president of the Alabama League of Aging Citizens. Mr. Hanan wrote of a promise he made a friend who died of cancer, a promise to try and help find a cure for this killing disease.

During my years here in the Senate, Mr. President, I have been a strong and consistent supporter of cancer research. A little more than a decade ago, our great Nation declared war on the horrible disease of cancer. This war against cancer has not yet been won; our ultimate goal of completely wiping out cancer has not been reached. Still, important progress has been made in our search for a cure, and we must not stop now.

To emphasize the importance of carrying on this fight, Mr. Hanan has asked that I share his letter to President Reagan with my colleagues here in the Senate. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this letter to President Reagan be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOIN IN THE BATTLE AGAINST CANCER

The President,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: My good friend John died this week from cancer. I made a promise to my friend that I would try to help the researchers at the UAB Cancer Research Center to find the cause, a prevention and a cure for this killer of mankind.

Congressmen and the State Legislature singularly, or collectively, could help me keep my promise to my deceased friend. In a sense, when it comes to cancer, we are in a rut. This is a shame when we did the seemingly impossible and put a "Thing" on Mars. Cancer was a last priority, but it should be the first. Why Americans? Is it because we don't have enough concern? Is it because of ignorance and stupidity, or is it because of greed for the almighty dollar since billions of dollars are involved to solve the cancer problem? I don't wish anyone to get cancer, but if it has to be, then I wish it to be those that could have done more to eradicate this awful disease from this earth.

Many people think that the problem will have to be solved single-handedly, by medical researchers. This is not necessarily true. It can only be solved if the State Legislators and the U.S. Congress appropriate enough funds for the cancer institutes. I sincerely believe the greatest waste of resources the world has ever known is the brain power of those of us in this medium of circulation. There must be individual incentive to solve this cancer problem. Approximately 10,000 Alabamians and 500,000 Americans will die from cancer in 1983, and it's our fault because we don't care! Let's turn this around. Buy a Blue Chip Stock Certificate in cancer research and support the Cancer Research Center at UAB.

Most respectfully yours,
RUBIN M. HANAN.

Re: Appointment of Bankruptcy Judges, April 1, 1984; Public law 95-598, Sections 201 and 402(b) (1978) [28 USC § 152].

President RONALD W. REAGAN,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to request that my tenure as United States Bankruptcy Judge at Anniston, Alabama, be continued by appointment under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978.

Continuously since November 8, 1961, I have presided over the Bankruptcy Court at Anniston, Alabama, holding court at Talladega, Anniston, and Gadsden, and serving the nine northeastern Alabama counties of Talladega, Clay, Cleburne, St. Clair, Etowah, Cherokee, DeKalb, and Marshall. My immediately previous term of office expired during the present "transition period," and my term of office (as provided in the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978) has been "extended to and expires on March 31, 1984 or when [my] successor takes office." Under this statute, this extension of my term of office occurred by virtue of my appearance before a "merit screening committee", its favorable recommendation, and the certification by the Chief Judge of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals that I was not found by him "to be not qualified."

Besides my continuous experience of nearly twenty-two years in presiding over the Bankruptcy Court in this area, I served as a standing chapter XIII trustee, under the previous Bankruptcy Act, for the continuous period from March 8, 1948, to my initial appointment on November 8, 1961. During that period of more than thirteen years, I was also engaged in the general practice of law here at Anniston, having commenced practicing law December 1, 1947, and ceasing upon my original appointment, November 8, 1961.

I was born at Anniston August 3, 1922, attended the public schools here, and graduated from the Anniston High School in 1940. I received an AB degree from Emory University in 1944, an LLB degree from the University of Alabama School of Law in 1946, and an LLM degree from the Harvard Law School in 1947. While a student at the University of Alabama School of Law, I was employed by its Bureau of Legal Research and Service to write case notes for the Alabama Lawyer, official publication of the State Bar, and I was elected by the faculty of the law school to the scholastic honor of Farrah Order of Jurisprudence. I am enrolled to practice law before the Supreme Court of Alabama, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. I have also been enrolled to practice as attorney before the Treasury Department of the United States.

I am a contributing editor of Norton, Bankruptcy Law and Practice (1981), published by Callaghan and Company, Chicago. I have lectured on bankruptcy subjects at seminars sponsored by the Continuing Legal Educational Programs of the University of Alabama School of Law and the Alabama State Bar Association. I have also lectured on bankruptcy subjects at seminars or institutes sponsored by Stetson College of Law, St. Petersburg, Florida, and Cumberland Law School, Sanford University, Birmingham, Alabama. In addition, I have served on the faculty of seminars for Bankruptcy Judges held by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts or the Federal Judicial Center; and, within the past three months, I have served as a member of the faculty of the Pacific Bankruptcy Law Institute at San Francisco and of the Western Mountains Bankruptcy Law Institute at Jackson Hole, Wyoming.

I have served as president of the Calhoun County Bar Association, as vice-president of the Anniston Jaycees, and as president of the Anniston Rotary Club. I am an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Anniston, and, prior to my appointment to the bench, I served as country chairman of the Heart Fund and as vice-chairman of the State of Alabama for the Crusade for Freedom. I am a member of the Calhoun County Bar Association, the Alabama Bar Association, and the American Bar Association.

As the Bankruptcy Courts enter a new era, I am sure that you will want to use this opportunity to appoint a carde of United States Bankruptcy Judges who will preside over these courts with fairness and efficiency and will conduct the proceedings in them in accordance with the mandates of the statutes governing these matters. I believe that I could confidently seek the endorsement of those whose opinions you may value for my continuing to serve as Bankruptcy Judge. I request your favorable consideration of my continued appointment, and I send my best regards.

Respectfully yours,

L. CHANDLER WATSON, JR.,
Bankruptcy Judge.

SEEKING A NEW PATH

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, two goals have become the compelling political and moral necessities of our lifetimes. One is removing the danger that nuclear weapons pose to life on Earth. The other is ending the runaway arms race that is sapping the economies of the world's nations and poisoning relations between sovereign states. Achieving these two goals has become the greatest challenge to our form of self-government since we successfully met the challenges of the Great Depression, World War II, and civil rights for black Americans. History will measure the quality of our political leadership by our capacity to rise to this challenge. If we do not, the magnificent heritage passed down to us by the creators of our Republic, and by generations of hard-working citizens, could very well slip away from us and from our children.

We can find a path for our country that is more secure than a ceaseless arms buildup. We can find a path away from the hostile climate of a second cold war with the Soviet Union.

Dr. Jerome Wiesner, a man of considerable experience and expertise in the field of arms control, who is committed to charting that new path for our country, is chairing a peace platform drafting committee that is seeking new ideas, initiatives, and approaches for the arms control platform of the Democratic Party. As it drafts a peace platform, the Wiesner committee is conducting consultations and hearings in the States. These are public hearings, open to citizens from all walks of life.

I call upon peace leaders, arms control experts, and concerned citizens to bring their recommendations to the Wiesner committee.

Today, I am entering testimony before the Wiesner committee in the State of Massachusetts on January 29. In the coming weeks, I will be entering testimony and recommendations from Wisconsin, New Hampshire, Iowa, and other States.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, testimony and recommendations before the Wiesner committee.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS PRESENTED TO THE PEACE PLATFORM DRAFTING COMMITTEE AT BOSTON COLLEGE

(By John O. Pastore, M.D.)

Thank you for the opportunity to contribute to your important work. My name is Dr. John Pastore. I am a Cardiologist at St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Boston and an Associate Professor of Medicine at the Tufts University School of Medicine.

From 1969 to 1971 I served as a research internist assigned by the United States Public Health Service to the Atomic Bomb Casualty Commission in Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Japan. The purpose of our work there was to investigate the delayed medical effects of whole body radiation on the Japanese survivors of the atomic bombings in 1945. Since that time, I have maintained an interest in the medical effects of nuclear war and the nuclear arms race.

We were asked to address this peace platform committee because of work done over the past 3 years in the physicians' movement against nuclear war. Specifically, at this time I serve on the Advisory Boards of the Greater Boston Physicians for Social Responsibility (PSR) and the International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War (IPPNW). In June of 1982, I was one of three American physicians who appeared with three Soviet physicians in an uncensored and unedited television broadcast seen on Soviet National Television by 100 million Soviet citizens. The theme of the broadcast was the medical consequences of nuclear war. During the show, we and our Russian physician colleagues agreed that nuclear war would mean the death of all mankind and that medicine would be powerless to help the suffering. Excerpts from that program have now been seen by approximately 10 million people in the United States over public television, and the program has been shown widely in Europe and in Asia.

In advising the Democratic party platform writers, a physician deeply committed to the prevention of nuclear war and to ending the wasteful nuclear arms race might perhaps emphasize a few key points.

We believe that important to any successful solution of the nuclear dilemma is a mutual and verifiable nuclear weapons freeze. PSR has consistently supported the nuclear freeze, and its 20,000 member physicians in the United States have been among the most outspoken advocates of the Freeze as a first step to meaningful reductions in the world's nuclear arsenals. It is widely known that 85 percent of the American people favor a nuclear weapons freeze between the United States and the Soviet Union. In a recent issue of Medical Month magazine, data were presented indicating that 62 percent of the 21,000 responding physician readers of that journal, a generally conservative constituency, also favor a bilateral and verifiable nuclear weapons freeze. Physicians for Social Responsibility has contributed to this level of awareness, and we think it important that 82 percent of physicians feel that doctors should tell the public about the medical consequences of nuclear war.

Our determination to do so springs from the fact that the Hiroshima and Nagasaki experience indicates that in the event of an all out nuclear war as it would be waged today, Medicine could offer no effective response and indeed no consolation to any of those not killed immediately by the devastating blast and fire storm effects. In fact, the data from Japan indicate that more than 80 percent of all physicians, nurses, and medical students would be killed outright in the earlier stages of nuclear war. Virtually all medical facilities would be rendered impotent. From my own perspective and experience with Hiroshima, however, the most devastating effects would come later. The fact is that radiation poisoning, or the fear of it, is something that renders illusory any thought of meaningful "survival" after nuclear war exposure. And we must remember that the world now has at its disposal in its 50,000 nuclear weapons the fire power of one million Hiroshimas.

The mind cannot grasp the medical devastation which would result from such a holocaust. Recent medical studies published by members of our organization indicate that in the post-attack phase alone infectious diseases which we now think of as having been conquered would once again become epidemic. Only the most primitive and resistant of life forms could be left . . . a world of rats, roaches, and grasses.

The International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War, representing 70 thousand physicians in over 50 countries on both sides of the East-West abyss, is also on record regarding the ineffectiveness of Civil Defense in the face of nuclear war. On our Soviet television broadcast, we told the Russian citizenry, as we have told our own, that evacuation plans as an approach to nuclear war planning are insane. A recent study, quoted more extensively below, indicates that in fact 79 percent of Soviet children surveyed and 38 percent of American kids felt that their country would not survive a nuclear war.

For several years, the physicians movement has also been arguing for a no first use policy. From a medical standpoint, our strong opposition to a national defense posture which allows for the first use of nuclear weapons rests upon the incredible psychological trauma which such nuclear war planning encourages among the peoples of the world. In fact, at the Third World Congress of IPPNW held in the summer of 1983 in Amsterdam, the failure of the present administration to denounce the first use of nuclear weapons, it was generally agreed, constituted an unconscionable threat to world peace and security. The policy allowing for the first use of nuclear weapons also blurs the distinction between a nuclear and conventional arsenal, and we have the medical data on that distinction. The fact is that in Hiroshima, people near the hypocenter were vaporized, leaving their photographic impressions upon the bridges on which they stood, so intense was the sunlike heat of the explosion.

Wounds which seemed benign at first, and which would have been in conventional wars, would not heal because of the depletion of blood elements through radiation sickness affecting the bone marrow. As I have noted, the even longer term effects were horrendous. Leukemia, especially among children, had its peak incidence 7 years after the Hiroshima holocaust. Therefore, we continue to insist that nuclear weapons are not the same as conventional weapons, and we argue that the threat to use nuclear weapons should not be part of a sane defense policy aimed, for instance, at preventing conventional war in Europe.

The bottom line is that the possession and threat to use nuclear weapons now constitutes, we feel, the greatest threat to the peace and security of the United States and our allies.

Before his recent and untimely death, Senator Henry Jackson of Washington told us in private session that his greatest concern was for those nuclear weapons which would soon be in the hands of terrorists throughout the world. His opinion was that neither the Soviet Union nor the United States was foolish enough to start nuclear war, but he thought that the nuclear superpowers needed better communication in order to prevent an accidental or terrorist-initiated nuclear holocaust.

Although physicians, scientists, and educators have succeeded, against all odds during the lifetime of the present administration, in preserving East-West contacts, who can doubt today that we are farther away from meaningful East-West dialogue on the nuclear arms issue than we have ever been before. Physicians who share a common medical language and who refuse to dwell upon those otherwise important issues which divide East and West wish to see in our next administration a recognition of the imminent risk of nuclear war, a mature approach to the incredible waste of the nuclear arms race, and a resolution to do something about it beyond rhetoric and gratuitous insult.

Recently, attention has been focused on the children who live on both sides of the nuclear abyss. Up until now, there have been few data regarding the effects of the nuclear arms race on the world's children. It is true that Javier Perez de Cuellar, the Secretary General of the United Nations, had told our International Physicians that each day 40,000 children die of starvation; and he spoke to us in the context of the expensive nuclear arms race.

However, even more relevant data are beginning to unfold as a result of work done by the International Physicians movement. The fact is that 12 percent of Soviet high school age children and 38 percent of American high school students responding to the same questionnaire feel that nuclear war between the United States and the Soviet Union will happen during their lifetime. Eighty-one percent of Soviet kids and 41 percent of the American children questioned believe that they and their families would not survive a nuclear war. Interestingly, 93 percent of Soviet children and 65 percent of American children feel that nuclear war between the super powers can be prevented.

A peace committee responsible for formulating national policy should insist that the next administration take the risk of nuclear war more seriously than is being done at the present time. Such a committee must castigate as illusory the quest for nuclear superiority and come to terms with the absolute unusability of nuclear weapons.

There are some diseases which even modern medicine cannot cure once they take hold; they can only be prevented. Nuclear war is such a disease. As you know, physicians have called it the final epidemic. However, the nuclear arms race is damaging and wasting lives even though nuclear weapons have not been used in anger since 1945. How long can the children of our country live under this threatening mushroom cloud and still maintain the kind of stability that is necessary to keep our country strong?

How long can their optimism survive the dulling fatalism with which they are now surrounded? How do we prevent their cynicism upon hearing the sparks of the holocaust described as "peacekeepers"?

The challenge for the next administration will be to undue a suicidal march towards a nuclear future. The task is nothing less than the prevention of the annihilation of human life as we know it.

In this election year, there are many issues, both domestic and foreign, about which the American people may be confused and torn. However, the survival of our nation and the sanity of our children is not a confusing issue. Rhetoric and election year turns of phrase will not fool the American people. Our experience in speaking with them is that they can understand this nuclear war problem and the nuclear arms race if it is presented to them honestly, forcefully, and with the conviction that a solution can and must be found.

In summary, we would encourage you to etch into the party platform unequivocal support for the mutual, verifiable nuclear weapons freeze as a first step in the reduction of the world's nuclear arsenals. A policy of no first use should be announced clearly for all to hear. A comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty should once again become one of our nation's priority concerns. The concepts of limited nuclear war and survivable nuclear war should be disowned as the nonsense which they are. The next administration should vow to avoid the temptation to use international grievances and points of friction between the nuclear superpowers as excuses for the promulgation of a wasteful and dangerous nuclear arms race. The United States and the Soviet Union together should begin work now on ending the proliferation of nuclear weapons to the fringes of our world—to terrorist and unreliable regimes.

Finally, the present spiteful and immature approach to international negotiations between the superpowers must be ended if the risk of accidental nuclear war is to be reduced.

The first task of the new American President will be to stop the nuclear arms race. All other problems pale by comparison. The medical case against the nuclear arms race should be seen by our citizens as a contribution to the mandate for courage, involvement, and change.

Our children and the generations yet to be born demand no less an effort.

A PEACE PLATFORM

(Edgar Bottome)

There is no need to explain to this group the deplorable state of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. Relations between the two super powers have rarely been worse and the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. have never been closer to mutual annihilation. The current crises in the Middle East, Europe and the Caribbean Basin have combined with the hostility and intransigence of the Reagan Administration to heighten the current instability in the balance of terror. The uncertainty surrounding current Soviet leadership serves to magnify these difficulties.

Negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union have totally broken down. Continued American reliance on a "first use" doctrine in Europe and continued United States insistence on the development and production of strategic first strike weapons systems have increased the tensions of the Cold War.

If this impasse is to be resolved and if meaningful negotiations are to take place between the United States and the Soviet Union, the whole historical pattern of the arms race is going to have to be reversed. I would like to take a moment to examine how we arrived at our present quandary.

As Americans, it is hard for us to realize and admit to ourselves that the whole history of the arms race has been a history of American initiated escalations and superiority over the Soviet Union in every major category of strategic nuclear delivery systems. Let us look at the record:

The United States was the first nation to develop and use the Atomic Bomb.

The United States was the first to encircle the Soviet Union with medium range nuclear bombers.

The United States tested the first thermonuclear weapon.

The United States developed and put into operation the first intercontinental bomber force.

The United States put into operation the first medium range ballistic missile force around the Soviet Union.

The United States deployed the first significant intercontinental ballistic missile force.

The United States deployed the first subsurface launched ballistic missile force.

The United States introduced the first multiple independent re-entry vehicles on the ICBM and the SLBM missile forces.

The United States introduced the first highly accurate ICBM multiple warheads in an operational status.

Today, the United States has a clear lead over the Soviet Union in the technology represented by the Trident II and the Cruise missile, the basing of the Pershing II, the total number of warheads represented by the American triad of strike forces. Throughout the entire history of the arms race, the United States has had a substantial technological and delivery system advantage over the Soviet Union.

Yet, the mythology of the arms race is pervasive and won't seem to go away. From the "bomber gap", to the "missile gap", to the current "window of vulnerability" United States inferiority has been claimed at budget time. Yet each of these alleged U.S. weaknesses were in fact used to mask an enormous superiority in the United States triad of strategic nuclear attack forces.

It is this U.S superiority in weapons systems combined with the American "first use" doctrine and the continued building of first strike systems that have meant that meaningful negotiations with the Soviet Union have not been possible. No matter what the intentions of the Soviet Union, there is no way that anything significant can happen in the field of arms control until the leaders of the USSR are convinced that they are dealing with a power that is negotiating in good faith. American posture and actions do not in any way convey this intention in 1984.

After an examination of the historical superiority of the United States in the nuclear arms race and the continued American efforts in this area, the question logically arises: "Why does the United States continue to strive for nuclear superiority in an age when more weapons only seal the certainty of our destruction as a nation?" Or, put in more concrete terms: "Why must we build the MX, Trident II, and Cruise systems?" They detract from our security, not add to it.

The answer to these questions is to be found in the underlying belief on the part of the United States government that nuclear weapons can play an active and integral role in the conduct of American Foreign Policy. These weapons serve not only as a deterrent to Soviet nuclear attack but also as the terroristic foundation of deterring any Soviet response to United States actions world wide. The unspoken belief of the current Administration is that American superiority can frighten the Soviet Union into inaction in response to any American military operation anywhere in the world. The corollary to this doctrine is that US superiority can prevent the Soviets from taking initiatives of their own. I am not claiming that this policy works, only that this is the policy of the United States.

The United States today conducts a foreign policy based on the threat of military intervention relying on a highly mobile, well armed force capable of rapid deployment world wide. American nuclear weapons are the shield behind which this force operates and the first strike capability of these weapons are designed to deter any Soviet response to American intervention. So long as the United States conducts its foreign policy based on an interventionist sword behind a nuclear shield, not only are negotiations with the Soviet Union impossible, but the probability of a major war dramatically increases.

In order for fruitful negotiations to take place, the United States is going to have to relinquish its historical drive for nuclear superiority and the concurrent threat of a first strike against Soviet delivery systems. Both sides must give up the production and deployment of weapons systems that have the speed, accuracy and invulnerability that characterize first strike systems.

Under no circumstance can we await the arrival of mutual trust between the two super powers in order to begin the process of arms reduction. Nor is mutual trust even necessary to arrive at a halt to the arms race. Any agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union must be based on the common acceptance of the goal of national survival and a mutual desire not to commit national suicide or possibly ecocide. Based on a mutuality of interests and premised on technological verification, the finalization of fundamental controls on nuclear arms become possible. In those few areas where technology is not capable of verification, good faith negotiations should lead to on-site verification where needed.

In 1984, the Democratic Platform should begin with a new set of assumptions about the arms race and should then call for the following:

(1) A mutual freeze on the development, production and deployment of nuclear weapons.

(2) An immediate 10 percent reduction in American Military spending. I urge this in spite of the fact that 6 of the 8 candidates for the democratic nomination call for an increase in military spending of 15 billion dollars or more.

(3) A nuclear free zone in Europe.

(4) A Commitment to cease American military intervention into the internal affairs of other nations (Granada, Nicaragua, and Lebanon come immediately to mind).

(5) Finally given at least 7 national "war colleges", the Democratic platform should endorse the establishment of a "Peace Academy."

TESTIMONY OF FRANK CLEMENTE

Good afternoon. My name is Frank Clemente and I am Program Director of the national Jobs with Peace (JwP) Campaign.

The National JwP Campaign represents approximately 50 local campaigns in 20 states. Our campaigns are predominately based in urban areas such as Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Milwaukee, Baltimore, Atlanta, Seattle, Albuquerque and Los Angeles, and represent constituencies concerned about both the present course of U.S. foreign policy and joblessness, equal rights and access to a decent standard of living.

Over the past several years our campaigns have sponsored referenda in 81 cities and towns. Over 60 percent of the two million Americans voting on these referenda have approved of significant reductions in the military budget in order to better fund jobs and social programs in housing, health care, mass transit, education and industrial revitalization. Two of these referenda, in Pittsburgh and Baltimore, have mandated the local government to issue, on an annual basis, a study describing the impact of military spending to the local economy.

The JwP Campaign has garnered the support of 100 congressional representatives, 40 city and county councils, and thousands of national and local labor, religious, peace, and community organizations. In addition, the Wisconsin Democratic Party named JwP as its top priority at its convention in July and a number of other state conventions have included JwP planks in their platforms.

At all times in our educational and political work local JwP Campaigns have promoted and won acceptance for certain values and positions which I believe the Democratic Party stands for and therefore, must codify as part of its peace plank. Perhaps it can best be summed up in the statement—peace is not just the absence of war. Thus, any peace plank we propose should contribute greatly to:

Meeting the fundamental human needs of the American people;

Preventing nuclear war and reducing nuclear weapons;

Defending the people and territory of the US from military attack; and Pursuing international cooperation, peace and human rights.

We believe that significant cuts can safely be made in the military budget, and that these would meet the objectives I have just outlined. These proposals I am about to describe are not a wish list drawn up by choosing numbers out of a hat. They have been made by carefully analyzing US foreign and military objectives.

The military budget buys forces and arms. These forces have missions and the missions relate to commitments and supposed strategic interests. To challenge the military budget, it is not enough to simply chip away at a few particularly noxious weapons systems; the assumptions which underlie the military budget must be challenged as well. For example, spending for nuclear war—fighting weapons makes sense if the fighting of a nuclear war is the national objective. If such an idea is rejected, however, this weaponry, and a large number of complementary weapons systems, ships, troops and support are all unnecessary.

The following proposals for saving $68.5 billion in Fiscal Year 1984 Budget Authority are contained in an attached article entitled "This Time Let's Choose . . . Jobs with Peace." They received substantial congressional support in a FY1983 substitute to the Defense Authorization Bill (H.R. 6030). In addition, many expert defense analysts, past Defense Secretaries and present and former servicemen have testified to the efficacy of some or all of these recommendations.

These proposals fall under three broad headings:

1. Reducing Pentagon waste;

2. Freezing the nuclear arms race; and

3. Stopping arming for foreign interventions.

Let me outline the specific programs and budget savings that would result in 1984 from these recommendations . . . money that is critically needed to feed the hungry, house the homeless, educate our next generation and provide the fuel for an industrial revitalization that has a goal of full employment.

We can save at least $35 billion (and perhaps as much as $55 billion) in 1984 by reducing mismanagement at the Pentagon, requiring better weapons procurement practices and eliminating ineffective, vulnerable or redundant weapons systems. This can be done by:

Cutting waste, fraud and abuse of at least $10 billion. This is only one-third the figure quoted by the Grace Commission, the President's private sector task force appointed to investigate waste in the government. We've all heard horror stories about price-gouging. One can only guess how many chrome-plated wrenches the Air Force has bought for $9,609, which can be purchased at the local hardware store for only 12 cents.

We can cancel many ineffective, high-tech weapons and save $14 billion. The F-15 and F-18 fighter planes cost $35 and $38 million each—enough to hire 4,000 schoolteachers to teach 100,000 students—yet they haven't been proven to be necessary or to perform adequately. The $3 million M-1 tank needs about 2 hours of maintenance for every hour of operation. The Bradley fighting vehicle, built to carry troops into combat, is useless because those soldiers are afraid to ride in it as bullets can easily penetrate its aluminum sides. And the Sparrow missile at $200,000 apiece is no bargain if it only hits its target 8 percent of the time.

The naval expansion program should be scrapped saving us $6.9 billion. It is not the responsibility of the U.S. to be policeman of the world, which is the primary rationale of our naval expansion. Aircraft carrier "battle groups" should not be increased from 13 to 15 and should even be decreased pending a re-evaluation of our foreign commitments. Old battleships should not be restored as well. Even conservative Sen. Barry Goldwater has criticized this waste by saying, "Restoring old battleships is like trying to revitalize the army by digging up Gen. Custer."

Related cuts in operations and maintenance would save $4 billion for a total of $35 billion.

A Nuclear Weapons Freeze would save approximately $25 billion in FY84. Just two of our forty Polaris submarines carry enough nuclear warheads to destroy every Soviet city with more than 100,000 people. The Freeze would maintain our nuclear deterrent while stopping the production of new nuclear weapons which are designed to wage a nuclear war.

We believe that support for the nuclear weapons freeze in the party's platform requires all Democratic public officials to support cancellation of funding for all nuclear weapons programs including the MX missile, the Pershing II and cruise missiles, the Trident submarine and missiles and the B-1 bomber. Related cuts in operations and maintenance and the cancellation of other DOD and Energy Department nuclear weapons programs must also be included.

JwP believes that the third primary element of any Democratic Party peace plank should be the curtailment of funds for foreign intervention. Savings in this category in 1984 would be at least $8.5 billion. We believe, by and large, that unrest and revolutionary struggles in the developing world are not a manifestation of East-West conflict, as the Reagan administration would have us believe, but instead, are a result of extreme inequality, dire poverty, and lack of political representation in determining that countries economic priorities.

We oppose funding for the Rapid Deployment Force, not only because it duplicates the role of the U.S. Marine Corps, but because its primary objective is to intervene against small countries where economic development and diplomacy is most needed. We believe the Democratic Party should oppose military aid and weapons sales to governments which violate human rights and repress labor organizing. Included are El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala, the Philippines, Chile, South Korea, Pakistan, Turkey and South Africa.

The business of the U.S. government, the world's largest arms exporter, should not be to support dictatorships which provide attractive investment climates for US corporations—causing the loss of millions of jobs at home through runaway industry. Lastly, JwP supports an immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops from Lebanon and a cutoff of assistance to the Contras trying to destabilize Nicaragua.

Any peace platform which calls for such military reductions must also recommend legislation to minimize the impact of such spending cuts. Hundreds of thousands of families would depend on such protection.

As a first step, the Democratic Party should support the Economic Conversion Act soon to be introduced into the House by Rep. Nicholas Mavroules (D-MA). Passage of this bill would provide federal assistance for economic stabilization, retraining and local community development in areas affected by defense base closures and the termination of major defense contracts. The unity of two major forces in the Democratic Party—organized labor and the peace movement—depends on our ability to move beyond the "jobs blackmail" and "hostage communities" that presently exist as a result of our federal military industrial policy.

The proposals I have just outlined are but one side of the coin of a true "peace platform." As Dwight Eisenhower warned us 30 years ago: "The problem in defense is how far you can go without destroying from within what you are trying to defend from without."

These are very sobering words as we enter 1984 and ponder the choices that the Democratic Party must make, and stand for, in this election year. Peace is not just the absence of war. It also means equal access to an education, a guaranteed adequate standard of living, a job for all Americans and the rebuilding of our communities.

Despite the buoyancy of our present economic recovery the long term outlook is bleak for all but the richest 20 percent in America. There exists a growing structural economic crisis in our society. More than 30 million Americans live below the poverty line—the vast majority women, children and people of color.

Eight to ten million Americans will remain structurally unemployed for the foreseeable future. Black youth unemployment strikes one of two. Rapid deindustrialization is occurring—over 22 million U.S. jobs disappeared between 1969-1976 through plant closures and investement abroad. Finally, there has been a remarkable decline in the size of the middle class—from 55 percent to 40 percent of our population since 1978 as more and more families enter the lower income categories.

With the exception of bipartisan alarm over the deficit, "staying the course" is rapidly becoming the rallying cry for the mainstream of both political parties. The Democratic Party can not hope to win the Presidency in 1984 if it tries to beat Ronald Reagan at his own game. Polls show this overwhelmingly. Neither can we afford to return to nostalgia. The Democratic Party needs a genuine campaign on the future. One that proposes bold new initiatives to solve our economic and foreign policy problems.

A key aspect of this is the call for major transfers of public wealth from the military to the civilian economy—enhancing our security within and without.

GENDER GAP 1984 PEACE PLATFORM

(By Barbara A. Hildt)

At present, U.S. foreign policy is based on the willingness to use the threat of nuclear war to maintain U.S. political and economic control or influence throughout the world.

Women have been virtually excluded from formulating this policy, and the welfare of all American citizens has been ignored. As the gender gap has already indicated, women are less willing than men to approve first strike weapons systems such as the Pershing II Missiles which are capable of destroying so much precious life. We would not choose to spend more money on the construction of one Trident II submarine, armed with nuclear missiles which must never be used, than on mental health for the entire nation. Rather than spend $107 million for one MX missile, we would choose to build 2140 new units of housing. Most women can quickly see through the argument that this year's U.S. military expenditure of 248 billion dollars—20 percent on nuclear weapons alone—makes our country stronger and more secure. Most women consider skillful diplomacy as a viable and essential alternative to the increasingly deadly game of war.

Unless women in positions of leadership and influence take the initiative to demand major changes in our government's foreign and military policy, we shall bear partial responsibility for the dangerous course set by men in power. Women in the national coalition, Gender Gap 1984, therefore, urge the Democratic Party and all Democratic Presidential candidates to reduce the risks of nuclear and conventional war and to build a healthy economy and a just society by making the following commitments:

1. Pursue the negotiations of a verifiable bilateral U.S./Soviet freeze on nuclear weapons and their means of delivery through the following steps:

a. Call immediately for a simultaneous U.S./Soviet freeze on the testing and deployment of nuclear weapons.

b. Proceed quickly to negotiation in good faith of a U.S./Soviet freeze on the production of nuclear weapons as well.

2. Call on the U.S. to assume international leadership in the negotiation of a step-by-step reduction in nuclear weapons worldwide as soon as possible to a number well below 1,000, the global extinction level. Remind the U.S. of its obligation, as signatory to the 1967 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to cut down on its nuclear arsenal and thereby prevent further proliferation.

3. Decrease the military budget by at least 20 percent, primarily through the nuclear weapons freeze and the elimination of military waste and of excess profits by military industries.

a. Transfer military funds to human services: for example, education, housing, health care, transportation, job training and child care.

b. Promote legislation for economic conversion so that our nation can move from a war to a peace economy, and experience a major reduction in the federal deficit, inflation and unemployment.

4. Reject Reagan's deliberately deceptive "build-down" proposal, which allows the development and production of many new dangerous nuclear weapons systems.

5. Pledge that this country will adopt a policy of no first use of nuclear weapons and no deployment of first strike weapons which might force other nuclear powers to prepare for a launch on warning or preemptive strike.

6. Negotiate a ban on all weapons in space and a cut-off of all funds for Research and Development on the military use of space.

7. End the policy of U.S. military intervention in Central America, the Middle East and in sovereign countries all over the world and use instead constructive peaceful diplomacy in the settlement of regional and international conflicts.

8. Call for elimination of registration for the draft.

9. Improve the superpowers' hotline intercommunication system in order to prevent the possibility of an accidental nuclear war.

10. Establish a National Peace Academy or Department of Peace for the purpose of exploring and developing effective techniques of peaceful international resolution of conflict and the promotion of understanding, security and stability between nations. Particularly improve relations with the Soviet Union through people's cultural exchanges and through cooperative governmental efforts to seek genuine detente, an end to the Cold war, and mutually beneficial solutions to global problems.

11. Curtail U.S. involvement in the international arms trade.

12. Assure the meaningful participation of women in the formulation of all national policy, particularly foreign and defense policy, by appointing women to top level policymaking positions.

If the Democratic Party and its Presidential Candidates are seriously concerned about closing the Gender Gap, there must be a firm commitment to fulfilling this last position.

A PROPOSAL FOR THE 1984 PEACE PLATFORM

(By John Malcolm Forbes of the Council for a Nuclear Weapons Freeze)

The Democratic Party needs to seek "a fundamental change in our approach to war and peace, and a specific program to carry it out." To initiate such a fundamental change during the next four years, we will have to elect a president able and willing to commit his administration to two goals.

One of those goals is to act on the belief that "the policy of depending on nuclear weapons for the prevention of war is in direct contradiction to our objective, the abolition of war. We are therefore compelled to oppose this policy." (Toshiyoshi Miyazawa at the 1962 Kyoto Conference of Scientists; see Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, Feb. 1984, p. 18.)

A comprehensive nuclear weapons freeze by both superpowers is an essential objective of our government in seeking the goal of ending reliance on nuclear weapons to prevent war (or for any other worthwhile purpose). Such a freeze must be sought by a combination of unilateral initiatives and bilateral agreements.

Unilaterally our next president should halt the testing, production and deployment of nuclear weapons and their means of delivery, of space war weaponry, and of chemical agents of mass murder. He should make it clear that continuation of such a freeze will depend on Soviet willingness to respond in kind, and he should seek with the Soviet Union an immediate moratorium, to be followed by negotiations for a comprehensive, verifiable bilateral freeze and reduction of nuclear weapons and missile systems.

The other goal to which our next president must be committed is humane peace. To make that goal a policy commitment rather than a mere expression of good intentions will require redirecting current practices in the following ways.

(1) In relating to the Soviet Union the USA must seek arms control and real progress toward disarmament, mutually beneficial trade, and open communication. Such detente must be sought in recognition of the fact that while deep rivalries and antipathies cannot be wished away, they must not be permitted to drive us into suicidal expectations of war. Let our rivalry find expression in initiating proposals for arms control and disarmament—a front on which the Soviets have been more active in recent years than have we. The call for a nuclear weapons freeze is a good example of an issue where, despite the fact that it's in this country that a powerful popular demand for a freeze has growth, it is the Soviet government, among others, which has responded positively to that demand at the United Nations and elsewhere.

(2) In relating to other governments and peoples the U.S. Government must terminate the Reagan aspiration to command and control by direct, indirect or threatened military intervention, especially in Latin America, must seek international arms control and disarmament, must reduce its efforts to arm satellites and allies with advanced weaponry, must honor its commitments to the ABM and Non-Proliferation treaties, and must seek to strengthen, rather than weaken, the UN's role in promoting international security and cooperation.

(3) A humane peace can be achieved only by promotion of non-violent behavior and respect for the rights of others. In relating to American citizens as well as to people worldwide our government must reaffirm its dedication to responding to basic human needs and to giving priority attention to the promotion of self-reliant development, rather than catering to the giantism of corporate power and to the privileges of wealth. So long as "welfare" is denigrated by our government as consisting of wasteful handouts to the undeserving dregs of society, the forces of violence and despair, here and abroad, will breed government by force. That's not the way to peace. Our next president must be dedicated to building programs that can generate hope, justice and cooperation for all segments of society.

(4) Finally, our next president must be prepared to be deeply responsive to the peace movement in this and other countries. How? By including peace activists in his administration and among his advisors. By promoting the study of peace and conflict resolution at academic institutions, including the National Peace Academy which has yet to be established despite impressive preparatory work, and among civic and religious groups throughout the country.

The growth of a powerful peace movement during the last three years, combined with a fast-growing arms race, wars, and rising expectations that nuclear war may soon become inevitable will give our next president an extraordinary opportunity—an opportunity to initiate a fundamental change in our approach to war and peace and in doing so to strengthen the democratic foundations of our polity, to reaffirm the ethical foundations of our civilization, and to increase our hopes for a future hospitable to life.

TESTIMONY BY BRIAN FITZGERALD, DISARMAMENT COORDINATOR, GREENPEACE NEW ENGLAND

Greenpeace has been working for a little more than ten years toward a single goal in the field of arms control: a cessation to the testing of nuclear weaponry by the nuclear powers of the world. Toward that end, we have sailed into weapons test zones in Muroroa and Alaska; we sent a ship two years ago to Leningrad; we've walked into the Nevada Test Site. American electoral politics, however, is one proving ground we would prefer to avoid. We are here today neither to endorse a candidate nor a party, but we are willing to make suggestions concerning a program for disarmament to anyone who will listen; it so happens that some parties and candidates are more willing to listen than others.

We have been attempting to raise the issue of warhead testing for two reasons: one is the obvious concern we have for the environmental integrity of detonating nuclear explosions on or under the surface of our planet; the other is a more subtle point that requires some explanation.

Simply put, if the current nuclear arms race has an Achilles' heel, it is nuclear testing; it is at that point in the development cycle at which the escalation and proliferation of weapons technology is most vulnerable and most easily stopped. About once every three weeks the United States detonates a nuclear device underground at the Nevada Test Site; the Soviet Union tests with roughly the same frequency. These tests are absolutely critical to the development of new weaponry, and their cessation would impinge critically on the entire development, production, and deployment cycle. Most of the current testing program is devoted to "third generation" weapons; designs for smaller warheads for use with smaller, more accurate first-strike delivery systems as well as research into "star wars" technology—the kinds of systems that disarmament advocates will be fighting in Congress in ten years if they are not stopped now. Military planners have maintained that "battlefield confidence" in new weapons designs demands that they first be proven by testing, and they have fought hard against a test ban for exactly that reason. A good example of why this is so can be found in the M-1 tank. It was a design developed by billions of dollars worth of first-rate engineering know-how which proved incapable of climbing slight inclines or rolling through a forest without setting it ablaze once it had passed from drawing board to proving ground. It is hard to imagine anyone risking a first strike attack with unproven missiles carrying untested warheads; the less confidence a nation has in its weapons, the less likely they are to use them aggressively.

Thus, given that nuclear testing is a crucial link in the arms race, how can we justify calling it the weakest link?

First, the ease with which an end to testing could be achieved. Negotiations for a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty have been pursued by every U.S. administration since Eisenhower's, with the notable exception of the Reagan administration. Significant progress was made through major concessions by both the Soviet Union and the U.S., including an agreement concerning the usually thorny issue of on-site inspections, to the point that all parties agreed that they were within six weeks of a completed treaty when Carter, in response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, broke off talks in 1980. Since that time, the Soviets have repeatedly called for a reopening of negotiations, and subsequent developments in the fields of data encryption and seismic detection have made the entire treaty even more achievable. According to Lawrence Weiler, formerly of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency under Carter, only one element stands in the way of an end to nuclear testing by the superpowers: a lack of political will on the part of the United States.

Perhaps the most important argument in favor of an end to testing, however, is the verifiability of a ban on nuclear detonations. In an era marked by the superpowers' extreme distrust of one another, the only way we are going to see serious negotiations is if both parties can demonstrate to each other sincere committment to disarmament. If we are to see unchecked progress, we need to avoid the debilitating effects of accusations and counter-accusations of cheating. When we are dealing with agreements concerning numbers of missiles, numbers of warheads, and even, with the advent of the cruise missile, questions of deployment, verification becomes a highly technical and suspect process. Hardware can be hidden, specifications disguised; it is no longer possible, however, to keep a nuclear explosion a secret. The work of seismologist Lynn Sykes has demonstrated that modern seismic technology is capable of detecting a nuclear detonation of as little as one kiloton, with little chance of confusion with natural seismic events. The implication is this: with assured monitoring capabilities, neither superpower will need to rely on the precious little trust between them to assure compliance.

When the United States ratified the Limited Test Ban Treaty of 1963, we committed ourselves to the negotiation of a Comprehensive Test Ban. The Reagan administration's decision not to pursue talks thus represents a violation of at least one treaty in force; our general failure to secure meaningful arms control agreements with the Soviet Union represents the violation of another: the Non-Proliferation Treaty. That agreement, which will be up for review in 1985, is now suffering a serious erosion of support among the non-nuclear nations, who quite rightly see no efforts by the nuclear nations to live up to their responsibilities to disarm. We must confront the possibility of the collapse of that accord, and a race toward universal armament, as real possibilities unless the superpowers begin the task of disarmament. A Comprehensive Test Ban that sought universal accession would not only scotch the vertical proliferation of new weapons technologies, it would also ensure against horizontal proliferation of nuclear capabilities to those nations which are currently not members of the "nuclear club."

An end to testing is the single most achievable, verifiable, and effective first step we can take toward ending the arms race, and we recommend to the Democratic Party that it be an immediate priority and major plank of its arms control platform for 1984.

TESTIMONY FOR A PEACE PLATFORM

(By Joseph Gerson)

I am the Peace Secretary of the American Friends Service Committee in New England. Our office is located at 2161 Massachusetts Avenue, Cambridge, Massachusetts 02140. I want to thank you for the invitation to give testimony toward the development of a peace platform for the Democratic Party. As Peace Secretary of the AFSC in New England I supervise staff and help develop program for the AFSC in the six New England States. Our offices in New England played a major role in educating the public and helping to build popular opposition to the Indochina War. Our Western Massachusetts office was one of two organizations, along with the Traprock Peace Center, which first demonstrated popular support for a bi-lateral nuclear weapons freeze through its work on referendum in 1980. Other staff and committee members have played major roles in helping to do the public education and organizing which led more than 300 New England cities and towns to back the Freeze.

Much of my work has focused on the Israeli-Palestinian-Arab conflict and other dynamics in the Middle East. I have participated in three fact-finding trips to the region and will return again next month. More recently, with the widening wars in Lebanon and Central America I have been examining and educating people about the relationship between U.S. foreign military intervention policy and the possibility of nuclear war. I helped to organize the first "Deadly Connection" conference on this theme in December 1982. I edited a book on this subject and have placed articles on "The Deadly Connection" with the "Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists", "Nuclear Times", and "Christian Century."

If time allowed I would give testimony on a number of foreign policy issues which concern us: the need to follow through on the Freeze proposal to a negotiated agreement with the Soviet Union, the need to end U.S. support for South African apartheid, the U.S. war in Central America, the poverty draft, continuing efforts to isolate and destroy the Vietnamese government and the deployment of new weapons systems—such a sealaunch cruise missiles—which make a bilateral nuclear weapons freeze impossible to negotiate. Because of the limitations of time I will confine my testimony and recommendations for the platform to three areas and the need to deepen awareness about the relationship between U.S. foreign military intervention and the possibility of nuclear war, the need for a fundamental change in U.S. policy relating to Lebanon, and the need for major changes in U.S. policy relating to the Israeli-Palestinian-Arab conflict.

THE DEADLY CONNECTION

While it is vital to see the proposal for a bilateral nuclear weapons freeze through to implementation, it is important to understand that a nuclear weapons freeze is not enough to prevent the nuclear holocaust. There are two ways in which a nuclear war is likely to be initiated: it can be started accidentally (a prospect which has been greatly increased by the development of ground launch cruise and Pershing 2 missiles in Europe), or it can be caused by a confrontation between the superpowers over what they believe to be in their vital interests.

Randall Forsberg, the director of the Institute for Defense and Disarmament Studies and author of the nuclear Freeze proposal, has stated that "the nuclear arms race has nothing to do with defense, little to do with deterrence, and everything to do with a monopoly of U.S. intervention in other countries while blocking Soviet intervention." Intervention in the Third World should thus be seen as the principal motor force of the nuclear arms race. Nuclear weapons serve as a nuclear umbrella for U.S. intervention in the Third World.

It is in this context that we can understand Presidential Memorandum No. 59 of the Carter Administration which moved the United States to a first strike policy, and the deployment of cruise, Pershing 2, MX and sealaunch cruise missiles. These decisions were taken after the collapse of the Shah's government in Iran, a time of nuclear parity between the United States and the Soviet Union, and the United States could no longer be certain of its dominant role in the Middle East. The creation and threatened use of this nuclear shield makes the Middle East, Korea, portions of Africa and—to a lesser extent—Central America all nuclear triggers.

In addition to this integral tie between nuclear and conventional war, there is also the reality of our nuclear weapons being used to intimidate defenseless nations. There is a long history of such intimidation, which is incredibly dangerous and wins us no friends. The most recent example of this policy is the deployment of ground launch cruise missiles in Comiso, Sicily. Former President Nixon has been quoted in the January, 1984 edition of "The Middle East" as telling German journalists that suggestions that these missiles are targeted against the Middle East and North Africa are "one hundred percent right." This policy of nuclear intimidation must be opposed by the Democratic Party.

The Democratic Party should also struggle to restore the firebreak between nuclear and conventional war. Many conventional weapons, like vacuum bombs, concussion bombs and the anti-personnel weapons used by the United States in Vietnam and by Israel in Lebanon are often more destructive than tactical nuclear weapons. Similarly some tactical nuclear weapons are designed to be "cleaner" and more precise. Dual capable weapons systems being deployed by our military around the world encourage field commanders to resort to nuclear warfare, with no certainties that it can be contained.

In summary the Democratic Party platform should call attention to the dangers of U.S. foreign military intervention and the deadly connection between our nuclear weapons policy and our foreign intervention policy. The Democratic Party should be committed to defusing not only the mechanical nuclear triggers, but the ones that grow out of regional conflicts and our efforts to maintain a "sphere of influence" which extends from our borders to those of China and the Soviet Union.

LEBANON

Reference to the Deadly Connection and the Middle East lead me to a local conflict and nuclear trigger that has been much in the news of late—Lebanon. U.S. and Soviet forces are stationed only 45 miles apart in Lebanon and Syria. President Reagan's statement in his State of the Union address that "Our Marines are helping (the Lebanese) break their cycle of despair" and that "there is hope for a free, independent and sovereign Lebanon," sound remniscent of promises of a "light at the end of the tunnel" in the Vietnam war era. President Reagan's wishful thinking has been received with appropriate skepticism by the majority of the American public.

The Lebanese war grows both out of Lebanon's internal problems associated with a constitutional structure that provides for unequal sharing of political and therefore economic and social power. The crisis has been exascerbated by intervention and manipulation of various Arab states. Israel and the superpowers. While Iran may be stirring the pot, and the Soviets are committed to losing no more face in Lebanon after the 1982 Israeli invasion, events in Lebanon are not controlled by either of these countries as this Administration would have us believe.

The Reagan Administration has moved from mistake to mistake in Lebanon. It gave Israel a "green light" for the 1982 invasion. It insisted on deploying a multi-national force led by the United States rather than neutral United Nations Forces to help evacuate PLO fighters, protect civilians and separate warring forces in August 1982, and then failed to live up to its guarantees as the massacres in Sabra and Shatilla so starkly testify. It negotiated the May 17 agreement between Israel and Lebanon, but failed to adequately involve the Syrians, thereby developing an agreement which then depended on Syrian agreement for its implementation. It changed the mission of the Marines in Lebanon last summer without consulting either the Congress or our NATO allies who had made contributions to the Multinational Force. The Reagan Administration has allowed the United States to become one more faction in Lebanon's civil war.

Permit me to digress for a moment. I recently received a letter from one of the current candidates for the Senate seat vacated by Senator Tsongas. In his letter this candidate stated that Marines were sent to Lebanon for three reasons: "(1) withdrawing all foreign forces from Lebanon; (2) promoting an independent Lebanon; and (3) securing Israel's northern border." These are the reasons President Reagan provided in October 1983, following the tragedy at the Marine headquarters and more than a year after the dispatch of the Marines to Lebanon. These are not the reasons originally given by the Administration which were limited to protecting civilians and separating warring forces. The Marines at the airport and the armada stationed off the Lebanese coast play a dubious role in contributing to the withdrawal of foreign forces, do not promote an independent Lebanon, and do nothing to secure Israel's northern border.

We appreicate the growing concern with the Democratic Party about the need to bring the Marines home and to work for an internal Lebanese settlement. The AFSC recommends that the Democratic Party Platform call for the following: (1) The withdrawal of all foreign military forces from Lebanon including Israeli, Syrian, Iranian and Multinational forces. This includes not only our Marines but the Armada which is the largest U.S. fleet assembled since the end of the Indochina War. (2) The replacement of Multinational Forces with United Nations observer forces whose primary mandate would be to protect civilians in Lebanon. This would be consistent with the original mandate of the M.N.F. and with the War Powers Act compromise which calls for the introduction of United Nations forces before the 18 month deadline if it can be arranged. AFSC discussions with U.N. officials in New York lead us to believe that such an arrangement would be helpful and possible. We understand that to win Security Council approval the Soviets would have to be involved in discussions, and we think that this would also be helpful. Our detailed proposal for United Nations Observer forces is appended to this testimony. (3) The commitment to press for more democratic power-sharing in Lebanon. The Democratic Part has rightfully called for progress in human rights to be associated with aid to El Salvador. Similarly aid to the Gemeyal government should be contingent on its taking serious steps toward power sharing.

ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN-ARAB CONFLICT

Let me turn to the more central Israeli-Palestinian-Arab conflict, about which I should say candidates Jackson and McGovern have been the most thoughtful. Too many within the peace movement and within the Democratic Part have either refused to look at this conflict or have looked at with blinders on. It is central to the question of who lives and who dies, and it is central to world peace. It is a conflict rooted in the struggle of both the Israeli people and the Palestinian people to survive, as individuals, as a culture, and as a nation of people. It is a regional conflict which I hardly need remind people has resulted in nuclear confrontations in 1967 and 1973. A commitment to peace must embrace authentic commitments to justice and survival for both Israelis and Palestinians.

We are today in a critical period which is not without some hope. It is essential to understand the dangers of Israeli integration of the West Bank. In the words of Meron Benvenisti, the former Deputy Mayor of Jerusalem, it is "Five Minutes to Midnight" on the West Bank. Continued Israeli occupation of the West Bank and the increasing numbers of settlements are harmful to Palestinians and destroy the prospect for settlement between Israel and the Palestinians. We need to understand that just as Jews refused to disappear so as not to disrupt the lives of the Christian West, neither will the Palestinians disappear. For me, as a Jew, one of the most important lessons of the Holocaust is: "Never Again to Anyone."

The United States and Israel have failed to respond to initiatives from within the PLO and from Arab states indicating a willingness to compromise with Israel. The Moderate Arab position calls for Israeli withdrawal from lands conquered in 1967 and the recognition of the Palestinian right to self-determination. This lack of response has delayed the day when Israeli, Palestinians and representatives of the Arab countries can sit down to negotiate. It is important, however, to be aware that this commitment is still alive. After Yasir Arafat's departure from Tripoli the majority of Palestinians appear to recognize that the only way forward is through diplomacy and peace negotiations. Arafat is still very much the leading force within the PLO, with 92 percent of the people on the West Bank backing him in recent polls. It was Arafat who did much of the leg work that led to the return of Egypt to the Islamic Conference and Arafat who has been talking to President Mubarak.

There is a deep concern in sectors of our government that the Reagan Administration has ceased working for Middle East peace and is willing to settle for the polarization of the Middle East with the hope that the balance of power will favor the United States. This is in no one's interest. Thoughtful leaders understand that when there is no momentum toward peace in the Middle East, there is momentum toward war. This underlines the importance to support efforts to and respond to initiatives which may come from the Europeans and Arabs which recognize the need for Palestinian self-determination and Israeli security needs.

We understand that efforts are being made to have the Democratic Party Platform call for the moving of the U.S. embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. This would be a grievous error. It would constitute recognition of Israeli annexation of Jerusalem and portions of the West Bank and undermine United Nations resolutions 242 and 338 which the United States recognizes as the basis for negotiations.

We recommend that the Democratic Party adopt the following positions in its peace platform. The Democratic Party should be committed to working for a comprehensive Middle East peace. Such a peace should provide for Israel's secure survival within its pre-war 1967 boundries with variations subject to negotiation for security reasons. It should respect what President Carter called the "legitimate rights of the Palestinian people" including the right to a state of their own, providing that state is committed to living in peace with Israel. It should provide for mutual recognition of all parties to the Middle East conflict.

Various Israeli Labor party officials have spoken with our staff based in the Middle East imploring the United States to take concrete actions which would demonstrate an American commitment to the 1982 Reagan initiative or other reasonable peace initiatives. They have indicated that they believe the United States is currently subsidizing the rejectionist and expansionist policies of the Likud Government. We believe these entreaties make sense, and we recommend that the Democratic Party support the possibility of peace and your counterparts in Israel. We urge the Democratic Party to place in an escrow account that portion of aid to Israel which is used to build and maintain its illegal settlements in the Occupied Territories. This is estimated in Israel to be between three hundred million and five hundred million dollars. This would illustrate our continuing commitment to Israel while ending our subsidy that has been formally opposed by every U.S. administration since 1967.

I thank you for your thoughtful consideration of my testimony. The struggle for peace cannot be limited to efforts at arms control but must go to the roots of global conflict and threats to human life.

WATERTOWN CITIZENS FOR ENVIRONMENTAL SAFETY

(By Elizabeth Campbell Elliott)

To Members of the Peace Platform Drafting Committee: Watertown Citizens for Environmental Safety (WCES) is a group of concerned citizens who came together five years ago in response to the nuclear power plant accident at Three Mile Island. We wanted to use our democracy to take local action to protect and enhance the quality of our local environment—and thus the quality of our own lives and those of our children. A central environmental project has been negotiating a process of accountability between the Town and the Army Materials and Mechanics Research Center regarding their on-going practice of burning Uranium-238 in Watertown. Lead regulations, asbestos dumpings, tree plantings, and so on also interest us.

Over the five years we have been a community organization, our members have increasingly awakened to the ultimate environmental issue of our time: the threat of nuclear war. Most of our resources—physical, mental, emotional, financial—are now devoted to grassroots disarmament work in Watertown.

The WCES membership wishes to express to this body the all-pervasiveness of the link between environmental issues and the nuclear arms race. Any 1984 Democratic Peace Platform can certainly recognize, along with Carl Sagan, that if there were a nuclear war it would be "bad" for the environment. Any Platform can also recognize that currently the nuclear arms race is disastrous for all aspects of our environment—whether we speak of the specific by-products created in weapons' manufacture, or whether we speak of the entire economic fabric of a society that gives priority to the military-industrial complex. The nuclear arms race permeates all dimensions of our environment, and soon—unless decisive action is taken immediately—it will also radically encroach further into the environment of space with Reagan's "Star Wars" intentions. WCES feels very keenly connectedness of what happens literally in our backyards, and what happens across the Atlantic or Pacific, and what happens in outer space. One environment.

We feel there won't be a future environment of any sort unless we dovote our personal resources to disarmament. We also feel that there may not be an environment worth having preserved (if we are able to pull back from the brink of nuclear war) unless the policies of our government—blind to environmental consequences—are addressed in an on-going and serious fashion. We support, along other activities, Conversion projects with an environmental thrust.

To enable ourselves to make any headway with these difficult issues, we feel it is essential to be moving forward in a matrix that is created by a network of individual citizens reaching out to other individual citizens to take small, positive actions—actions that add up to powerful grassroots strength in our democracy. We look to you to make in good faith a genuine effort to bring to bare upon our government the intentions of the grassroots, to join in a positive network with us, and to take not-so-small critical actions on several fronts in 1984, and vote as if our lives depended on it.

TESTIMONY ON THE PEACE PLATFORM

(By Mark D. Levine)

A peace plank is an absolute necessity in 1984. However, it is not sufficient that such a statement—such a promise to the voter—repeat the nuclear freeze pledge, which is essentially a beginning and a symbol, and also a historical concept at this stage in our development. I believe that many voters have come well beyond the nuclear freeze campaign in their awareness and that an assertive Peace Plank could help to bring that awareness into articulation.

I would argue that, for a peace/disarmament plank to have any value as policy and politically in the election, it must focus on the root cause of the dangerous nuclear weapons arms race: the problem of justice—social justice, economic justice, human justice.

As an occasional liaison person with the international peace movement and also as an organizer at the most grassroots level, I have learned that it is the concept of justice which binds people everywhere. Nuclear disarmament is subsumed under this topic, and is in fact a source of divisiveness on social class and education lines when it is detached from it and made the all important, exclusive topic. Certainly, if the Democratic Party is to include disarmament among its planks, it should, in my opinion, couch its statement and plan for policy within the larger questions regarding how people and nations treat one another:

1. Economic conversions—"swords into ploughshares", cooperative planning by business, labor, citizen, government.

2. Striving for economic equity.

3. Reversing the present administration's deemphasis on Social Welfare programming.

4. Social justice here and abroad. Again, reversing the present policy of supporting injustice.

I leave to others presenting the further elaboration of these positions. However, I would like to be on record as strongly supporting such an emphasis on justice issues in the Peace Plank of the Democratic Party platform. It is such boldness and fidelity to the principles of the Democratic Party that will bring to the polls those who favor bringing the bounties of this earth to all the people. Safety from the nuclear weapons peril will follow from such a position. At least, that is the hope and the tradition.

Thank you, and good luck to us all.

STATEMENT FOR THE PEACE PLATFORM HEARING

(By Caroline Bridgman-Rees)

In 1983-84, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom has on its agenda four main areas of concern:

1. Stop the Arms Race.

2. Resist Intervention and Support Self-Determination.

3. Demand Economic and Social Justice.

4. Encourage Cooperation not Confrontation.

Since many of these four areas of concern have already been spelled out in statements by other peace organizations here today, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom would like to mention briefly 8 specific issues which we feel the Democratic Party should address particular attention:

1. Nuclear Weapons. The U.S. must cancel the deployment of all first-strike nuclear weapons. The U.S. must declare "No First Use." The U.S. must never again use the nuclear threat in the carrying out of its foreign policy. The U.S. must begin to negotiate in good faith and pursue genuine detente with the Soviet Union for a change. The Democratic Party should develop its defense policy on the recognition that nuclear weapons are weapons of mass destruction and, therefore, forbidden and declared illegal and outlawed by international law since the 19th century.

2. Defense Industry and the International Arms Trade. The U.S. Congress must produce legislation making all manufacture of arms for U.S. defense non-profit (as manufacture of government stamps by the Post Office is non-profit, for example) or legislation making all arms industries tightly controlled and supervised and subject to heavy taxes against excess profits. The U.S. should stop sales of all arms to foreign countries, since the international arms trade is a means to maintain, encourage, or start wars, and approximately 30 million people have been killed since World War II, to a great extent because of the availability of arms which the industrial countries have peddled for profit and power. The U.S. should also stop selling instruments of torture and repression all over the world and should no longer have U.S. military men involved in the training of foreign police forces and of foreign military men here and in foreign countries.

3. CIA. The CIA must be curtailed drastically in its covert activities. The CIA was established to get valuable information for defense purposes only. It should not be involved in the destabilization of sovereign governments. Its budget must be carefully monitored by Congress, and its activities and the parameters of its authority must be constantly scrutinized and reassessed.

5. Military Interventionism. Military intervention by the U.S. must be stopped. The invasion of Grenada must be condemned, and such an invasion must not be allowed to occur elsewhere. Also condemned must be U.S. military maneuvers in Honduras; U.S. interference in Nicaragua and threatened invasion; U.S. support of the military regimes in El Salvador and Guatemala. All American soldiers and "advisers" should be brought home from Central America (as they should also from Lebanon and from all other countries of the world where they are now stationed). The Kissinger Commission Report must not only be repudiated, but Mr. Kissinger himself must be condemned and never again allowed to have any position of power or influence in the making of public policy. According to the criteria set up at the Nurenberg Trials after World War II, Mr. Kissinger is a major war criminal bacause of the policies he directed during the Indochina War which led to the death or destruction of millions of Indochinese people.

6. Economic Conversion. The Democratic Party must do all it can to turn this country's economy around from the permanent war economy it has developed since World War II to a much healthier economy built on jobs with peace and justice and environmental safety. The obscenely bloated military budget of the war economy is way beyond any legitimate price of defense; it is the main cause of inflation, unemployment, and the neglect of the social sector; it leads inevitably to national demoralization, false priorities, and the corruption of work and values; it also endangers the survival of Americans and of the whole human race.

7. Women's Equal Political Rights. Women must be given an equal role and responsibility in government at all levels. This year's theme for the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom is LISTEN TO WOMEN FOR A CHANGE. American women demand real change, as the Gender Gap shows. Women know that our nation's security is based on the quality of life for all its citizens and for the environment we depend on, and they know also that negotiation, not force and confrontation, must become the rule in international relations. Women leaders in arms control and disarmament must be represented equally at all negotiations in Geneva and elsewhere.

8. U.S. Foreign Policy vis a vis some Communist Countries. U.S. foreign policy must be made worthy of our country's best, not worst, heritage. Our government's behavior toward Cuba and Vietnam, for example, is short-sighted, willful, mean, and counterproductive. We should recognize and trade with all legitimate governments.

TESTIMONY OF ELIZABETH CAMPBELL ELLIOTT FOR THE LEGISLATIVE TASK FORCE OF NEW ENGLAND CAMPAIGN TO STOP THE EUROMISSILES

To Members of the Peace Platform Drafting Committee:

The New England Campaign to Stop the Euromissiles, through its Legislative Task Force, would like the 1984 Democratic Peace Platform to include specific reference to the Euromissile situation.

The 1984 Democratic Peace Platform should call for:

1. The withdrawal of all U.S. ground-launched cruise missiles and Pershing II missiles currently deployed in Europe.

2. Cancellation of U.S. plans to deploy ground-launched cruise missiles and Pershing II missiles in Europe in exchange for Soviet dismantling of all SS-4's and SS-5's and a reduction in the number of SS-20's to the level of the independently targetable warheads of the British and French nuclear missile force.

3. The resumption of the START and INF talks. These talks should be combined.

COMMENTS RELATING TO MY TESTIMONY BEFORE MEMBERS OF THE PEACE PLATFORM HEARING

(By Richard B. Maffei)

Thank you for the opportunity to speak to the issues of Peace in our time. I am a Professor of Computer Sciences, have taught at the University of Washington, the University of Pennsylvania, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Dartmouth College and Boston College. I have been a consultant to many large corporations and small ones. I have been a consultant to many State governmental agencies and to Federal government groups including the Army, Navy and Air Force. I've taught on a part-time faculty member at the Air Force Institute of Technology. I've been involved in studies of Biological, Chemical, Radiological and Nuclear Warfare in responsible positions. I am a retired dean of a graduate school of Management and have deep involvements with small and growing companies. My main involvement is presently as a member of the Massachusetts Nuclear Freeze Committee as the delegate from the 6th Congressional District. The Committee is the "capstone" group representing the many local "freeze" groups in our Commonwealth.

I would like to focus my remarks into three main categories: (1) Some basic long-term issues; (2) some basic substantive realities, and; (3) some suggestions for the platform committee derived from a consideration of both (1) and (2) above. My principal message is that the Arms Reduction issue is the most paramount issue that the world has ever or will ever face. We must seek for and find the solid bases for reconciliation among the major powers with no delay.

BASIC LONG-TERM ISSUES

1. The prospects for the world are infinitely ominous. The major powers of this world can destroy all persons and civilizations, and most other countries of the world appear to have little say on the issue.

2. The dangers are more deep than we usually realize, given the passage of time. The likely confrontation of the U.S. and U.S.S.R. is only one problem, albeit a very important one. In the next few years or decade there will be other problems with which we will have to deal. Those problems related to (1) proliferation among other nations of the world; (2) powerful weapons in the hands of committed terrorists; (3) accidents and shortened warning times, and (4) growing difficulties relating to command, communication, control and information gathering, interpretation, and dissemination within ever decreasing time boundaries.

3. The genius of our technologists and the technological improvements that will provide ever, a flow of new weapons that will drive the systems (U.S. & U.S.S.R. alike) to emulate one by and from the other.

4. The unlikelihood that even if we survive the near term dangers for a few decades, that humankind's unnatural inclination to be angered and contrary, along with the enabling technological ability to deliver on one another ever more destruction, will still make the world an ever more dangerous place for our children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. With the present actions of our present leadership (to be distinguished from 'statesmanship'), the dangers will not abate.

5. The lack of awareness that conventional arms and their budgets are directly linked to tactical nuclear weapons and strategic nuclear weapons. Think of this scenario: there is a great power confrontation that does not end as a stalemate—one appears to be losing. The conventional arms approach is thus failing to provide a "win" situation for one of the combatants. What to do? Use tactical nuclear weapons? What then if that "first-use" side starts "winning". Clearly force will be met with escalated counterforce with the result of the nuclear winter probably already accomplished via the tactical use option, but here come the "big ones" now.

6. The lack of realization that in these times and for as long as the U.S. and U.S.S.R. survive, that one will be the technological and economic match for the other. In logical terms deterrence is just a way of adding fruitless more to fruitless more, at best.

7. The growing philosophic meaning of the notion of human rights and its behavioral consequences within the framework of a policy of interventionism. The search for the "right" policies is a most difficult one. In some sense one could argue that the U.S. is violating the human rights of many of humankind by eliminating them in an international forum (the UN) from the debate (since we act to arm and disarm without their inputs) about the most portentous issue that civilizations have ever needed to face. The U.S.S.R. can be similarly criticized. A worldwide consideration of this issue of possible genocide must take place on a worldwide basis. The human rights issue is broad, complex and central to the meaning of the preciousness of life which transcends simple-minded ideological debates of which we can be accused of in these past few years.

8. Understanding that the mechanisms of free and planned societies may be at the root of our inability to find bases of reconciliation.

SOME BASIC SUBSTANTIVE REALITIES

Leaving out some of the discussion points raised in the prior section, these are the major substantive points that arise from the complex shape of the Arms Control issue. These points lead then to suggestions for writing a plank in the Democratic Platform.

1. Gaining stability in policy requires that a long-term and very broad view of the problem must be a primary intention. Statesmanship must replace (pseudo)-leadership.

2. Scientific knowledge must ever be sought out. It is fruitless and dysfunctional to thwart its acquisition. Applied engineering is an entirely different matter.

3. The world must be seen as it is. A complex network of human interdependence with rights for all human beings expressed in ways that point out what personkind can build heavens on this glorious earth of ours, with the knowledge and compassion available even now.

4. The U.S. and the U.S.S.R. are worthy of each other. One can always match the other and will. Lets do it with plow shares rather than anger and weapons.

5. Let us display meaningfully the fruits of a free society by understanding, explaning and transmitting the philosophy of free persons in ways that enhance aesthetic, economic, and knowledge growth among all the "children of God" in this world. We believe that a free society is the way to organize. Lack of understanding among others (even the Soviets) may make those others doubt the efficacy of our designs. Let us show them the way—in Peace.

6. A meaningful first step is to "freeze". We in the "freeze" movement and our potential real statesmen-leaders must outline the second and subsequent steps. One "second" would be: maintain and reduce stocks of weapons. By "maintain" I mean to keep the remaining weapons in a good state of readiness—without technical enhancement—while reductions take place, in a verified manner.

7. Consider ways to gain agreements on verification—which seems to be a (phony?) roadblock—by involving responsible third parties. Perhaps the UN could play a vital role here.

8. Given the deployments of de-stabilizing weapons (like Pershing and cruise), bring under close scrutiny the notions of proper command, control, communications, and information. There is a great danger for irretrievable accidents, as I see it.

9. Though I am not certain that this suggestion would not be terribly destabilizing if adopted, I would urge that the "build-down" logic be reconsidered with at least an order of magnitude change in the build-down ratios from say 2:1 to say 5:1, or even better 10:1 if Soviet concurrence were obtainable.

SUGGESTIONS FOR WRITING THE PLATFORM

I have explained in prior parts of this testimony that I am convinced that this issue is like no other issue that has ever appeared in personkind's history. If we do not quell the belicose instincts of personkind, at some moment in the future personkind with its own created methods of destruction will incinerate itself out of existence. Time is short and this coming election is both a crucial time and a time to seize a major opportunity to provide a basis of hope and possibly displaced love for all of personkind on our planet. My main suggestion is for one of proper tone. It should be girded by a powerful philosophical underpinning and express both hope and concern. It must be written in a way to raise significantly the consciousnesses of persons of the world, not only those of us here in this great land. Write it for all.

1. Commit to the infinitely serious problem of getting an immediate start on the solution to both long and short term problems of arms control. Emphasize the "freeze" and explain that technological advance, decreasing warning times, increased de-stabilization are facts of our lives.

2. Indicate the terrible problems in the long-run IF we fail to gain proper solutions to important problems as soon as possible. Proliferation, terrorism, accidents, and C^3I (command, communication, control, information) represents threats to all of human survival.

3. Emphasize the prospects for growth of personkind in a world with Peace and Understanding.

4. Emphasize the fact that there are long term bases for believing that ideological differences among super-powers can be reconciled. (They can, but the story is too long for this memo).

5. Emphasize that our system, under God, and committed to a philosophy of freedom and human dignity has meaning for all of the peoples of the world—not only U.S. Americans.

6. Emphasize the fact that the world new needs a very powerful international commitment, realizing that all the peoples of the world have an infinite stake in the nuclear war issue.

7. Do not place too much emphasis upon policy issues springing out of interventionism. In my mind—though certainly I think there are very important points to be made here—it diminishes the centrality of the nuclear war issue.

8. If possible, speak meaningfully of love and our churches' roles in the emerging future. At root, this issue of WAR is the deepest kind of theological issue (that I will not pursue here).

MAKE THE GREAT LAKES GREAT AGAIN

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Great Lakes contain one-fifth of the world's fresh water. This water has provided food, transport and recreation to Americans since the arrival of the first settlers, playing a crucial role in the economic growth of the Nation. The value of such a resource is incalculable, but the Great Lakes is too often treated as a gigantic unlimited dump.

In the 20th century, these bodies of water have become chemical waste dumps. The fisheries are depleted, the shoreline forests are clear cut, and the wildlife decimated. The reversal of this decline should be a national priority, but competing interests and selfish concerns have thus far thwarted all efforts at restoration.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of my colleagues to a two-part series outlining the problems that face the Great Lakes published last November by the Conservation Foundation. The author relates in chilling detail the transition from pristine abundance to polluted exhaustion that has characterized the condition of the lakes in this century. Several highlights well illustrate this tragic decline.

In 1949, commercial fishermen were able to harvest 23.8 million pounds of blue pike, a popular sport fish, from the waters of Lake Erie; 12 years later, through overfishing and pollution, the catch declined to near zero.

The herring gull may soon be a rare sight on the shores of Lake Ontario. A recent study has shown that poisons in the food chain have so weakened the walls of the baby chicks' shells that over 80 percent of the eggs are crushed before hatching.

Mr. President, the future of the Great Lakes is uncertain. But the danger seems of little concern to the myopic special interests that struggle to squeeze the last few drops from this abused and battered resource. For example, the Dow Chemical Corp. has refused to cooperate with the EPA, denying investigators access to test the effluents from their lakeside plants.

Mr. President, the overlapping patchwork of competing jurisdictions and the myopic selfishness of the special interests is killing the Great Lakes. A new agenda is needed in Great Lakes management, one that is conscious of the fragility and value of the resource, and the need for a concerted cooperative effort to reverse its degradation, I ask unanimous consent that the two part Conservation Foundation series be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWO CENTURIES OF ABUSE TRANSFORM THE GREAT LAKES

(By Tom Kuchenberg)

The Great Lakes region has been clear-cut for its lumber, manipulated to aid navigation, invaded by alien species, subjected to fish-stocking experiments, polluted by sewage, and contaminated by chemicals. Now this area—which contains no less than one-fifth of the world's fresh water—may be facing the threat of water diversion.

The many millions who reside in the region could well wonder where the next blow will come from. In recent years they have witnessed almost monthly revelations of new chemicals discovered in fish, birds, and drinking water. Many of these substances have had sinister effects on laboratory animals—and have even produced cancers in Great Lakes fish. (See box on page 7.) High concentrations of two, mercury and PCB's, have caused deformity and death among humans in Japan.

The bewildering assortment of chemical problems is, however, only the latest in a series of environmental crises to hit the Great Lakes area. In the 1960's it was stinking water, choking algae, and masses of weeds and dead fish piled on once beautiful beaches. In the '50's it was the destruction of magnificent food fish by an invading predator. Indeed, in the last 200 years the lakes and their basins have been totally altered.

Alterations have been deliberate, incidental, and accidental. The lakes are an environmental "sink". Inflowing rivers and streams gather and deliver pollutants from the entire basin to what are finite bodies of water. Toxic chemicals—released from long-buried and rusting containers, from fertilizers, and from improperly processed industrial and human waste—all find their way to one of the Great Lakes. Further, the very flow of the system, from Lake Superior to Michigan and Huron, and thence to Erie and Ontario, has gathered and concentrated the debris of society. We are able to measure the changes as the waters flow from nearly pristine Superior to heavily burdened Ontario.

Because of this unique perspective, the lakes could have provided early warnings of incipient environmental problems. However, the natural ecological unity of the lake system is overlaid by local, state, and national boundaries. The lack of cooperation among political jurisdictions has made it difficult to perceive the threats to the ecological system. Only as crisis followed crisis in this century has some cooperation between political jurisdictions become possible.

The major human impacts on the lakes can be divided into three phases involving the large—and largely deliberate—alternations associated with early settlement and exploitation; the impacts of eutrophication; and the invasion of toxic chemicals. Each phase reflects changing technologies and lifestyles. It is important to remember, however, that each stage has been felt at different times and with differing intensity in each lake.

FIRST STAGE: SETTLEMENT

When the original settlers reached the Great Lakes, the shorelines were dominated by magnificent climax forests of pine and hardwood. In summer, shaded streams and rivers delivered waters that were cooler than those presently flowing to the lakes. Organic sediments, now common on lake bottoms in some places, were confined to bays and marshes. Far more extensive wetland areas of swamp and marsh provided habitat for birds as well as refuge, spawning, and feeding areas for fish.

The fish community was dominated by older, bigger fish which constituted a far larger percentage of the total population than they do at present. They included certain species and subspecies that have since disappeared. Finally, there were no Pacific salmon, brown or rainbow trout, carp, smelt, alewives, white perch, or goldfish. Most likely there were no sea lampreys or else they were confined to Lake Ontario.

Ontario, the first lake settled, experienced the first recorded species extinction in the Great Lakes. A landlocked variety of Atlantic salmon spawned in the streams flowing into Ontario. Settlers erected dams in some rivers, thus blocking spawning migrations. Destruction of native forest cover brought masses of eroded silt into other spawning areas. Swifter runoff led to excessively low stream levels during autumn spawning and drove disintegrating spring ice into stream beds that were incubating eggs. By 1898, the salmon had disappeared entirely.

An increasing population fueled the lumber boom, which reached epic proportions in the upper lakes (Michigan, Huron, and Superior). In 1880, in the Saginaw valley of Michigan alone there were 60 sawmills in operation. Great fortunes were made and a small class of newly rich "Lumber Barons" came to dominate the social, political, and economic life of the northern areas. They resisted any suggestion of selective cutting or sound management of the forests. With clear-cutting, topsoil and sawdust cascaded down tributary streams, choking spawning grounds and destroying marsh areas. Massive rafts of logs were floated down the rivers to the sawmills. Watersoaked bark and logs, or "deadheads," littered river bottoms.[1] In the spring, as debris drifted into the open lakes it was concentrated by a phenomenon known as the thermal bar. Early warming inshore waters form a horizontal barrier against the deeper and colder part of the lake. This means that river-borne wastes and pollutants are held close to shore in the most productive spawning grounds.[2]

The Peshtigo, Wisconsin, fire storm of 1871, in which more than 1,300 people died, was only one of hundreds of fires that afflicted the region during the settlement period. Destructive effects often lasted for decades. Burn areas were transformed into swamps as root systems collapsed, streams became lifeless, and runoff patterns were altered. Clear-cutting produced many of the same results on a more gradual scale. The forests, believed to be so vast they would last hundreds of years, succumbed to the lumber boom in 60 years. Left behind were dying towns and impenetrable thickets of second growth.

The settlers of the last century also believed that, while the fish species were well-balanced and diverse, the situation could be improved. Lakeside residents can now read, with amazement, that the man responsible for introducing carp to the lakes received a governmental decoration and that crowds and bands gathered at railway stations to greet the newly arrived European fish. In the Great Lakes of today, the carp is held in slightly higher regard than rabbits in Australia, another unfortunate import of homesick Europeans. Rapidly proliferating carp have crowded more desirable native species and are regarded in many areas as a nuisance.

The final impact of the settlement phase of the Great Lakes came with the nearly simultaneous arrival of the sea lamprey and the alewife. Although some believe that the sea lamprey was native to Lake Ontario, most researchers hold that the predator reached the lake through the Erie Barge Canal in the 1850's. Although its presence was noted, the lamprey's most damaging effects in Lake Ontario occurred about the same time it invaded the upper lakes. It is believed that continuous downstream flow in the Welland Canal allowed the lamprey access to Lake Erie.

Not truly an eel, the sea lamprey has a spinal column composed of cartilage. Its mouth is a round sucking disc which the adult attaches to a prey. Using a tooth-like appendage, it cuts into its prey and sucks out blood and body fluids. During the 12 to 22 months of the adult cycle, a single lamprey can consume up to 19.6 pounds of fish, growing to a length of 30 inches in the process.

Lake trout, then the premier species of the Great Lakes fishery, was totally destroyed in Huron and Michigan. The speed of decline is shown by the fact that, in 1943, 6.8 million pounds of trout were taken from Michigan, whereas in 1952, the catch was down to 4,000 pounds. It is difficult now to imagine the magnitude of the lamprey feeding frenzy. At peak abundance in Lake

Footnotes at end of article.

Michigan alone they destroyed 5 million pounds of fish annually. Some observers stated that 85 percent of the fish not killed showed one to five scars from attacks they survived. With lake trout gone, the predators turned on burbot, chub, whitefish, lake herring, perch, walleyes, and suckers.

After a major effort, the lamprey was brought under control. But without the trout the food chain was deprived of its major predator. As a result, small silver alewives took over Lakes Michigan and Huron. The first specimen had been taken from Huron in 1935. Thirty years later it was estimated that alewives accounted for 90 percent by weight of all fish present in Lake Michigan.

The alewives were temporarily checked by a collapse similar to that experienced by the smelt in the early '40's. It is estimated that 70 percent of the alewife population died in 1967. Several billion decaying fish were heaped on beaches and clogged water intakes, making that spring particularly memorable. As with smelt, populations quickly rebounded and they had largely recovered by the mid-70's. That dramatic recovery was itself an indication of how thoroughly alewives had come to dominate the system.

It was evident by the mid-60's that species balance in the lakes had been vastly changed. With the lamprey under control, however, fish managers envisioned a great opportunity: the alewives would provide an enormous forage base for a first-class, commercially desirable predator. Attempts would be made to reestablish the trout. By itself, however, it was felt that trout would only exploit part of the alewife population. So another desirable species also would be introduced.

Since the 1870's, managers had tried to establish salmon stocks. In the spring of 1966, the Michigan Department of Natural Resources began stocking coho salmon. The enormous popular success of the experiment brought droves of sport fishermen to Michigan coastlines. Soon other jurisdictions rushed to stock coho, chinook and other salmon species. Initially it appeared that a partial solution had been found to the species disruptions of the settlement phase.

SECOND STAGE: EUTROPHICATION

In large areas of the northern Great Lakes the disruption of settlement was followed by a period of recovery. Lumbering operations moved westward. New growth slowly reclaimed the soil and reestablished the root structures of the obliterated forests. Farms, which in the boom years had been established in areas of short growing seasons and poor soil, were gradually abandoned. Large-scale reforestation projects of the 1930's, combined with the establishment of national and state forests, furthered the recovery. Erosion was to some degree controlled.

However, declining rural populations in the northern areas of the basin were more than offset by the rapid growth of cities along the southern shores. Great Lakes cities had always found the lakes and their tributaries a convention place to dump sewage and waste products so that, as early as the 1940's, dangerously polluted beaches were being closed in the summer. By the '50's, recreational areas along Lake Erie were being abondoned as huge algae blooms changed water to the color of pea soup. Putrifying mounds of stringly weeds and dead fish drifted onto shorelines increasingly surrendered to clouds of flies.

Without for the most part knowing it, lakeside residents were witnessing the accelerated deterioration of water quality and the aquatic environment, in a process called "cultural eutrophication"—chiefly from industrial and municipal effluents and agricultural runoff. (Heavy use of household detergents containing phosphorus was a prime contribution.)

The nutrient loading begins to change lakes from oligotrophic, or cold and nutrient poor, to eutrophic, warm and nutrient rich. Phosphorous and chlorophyll increase, dissolved oxygen falls below 6 parts per million and the taste, transparency, and smell of water deteriorate, with obvious adverse effects on recreation. Changes first become apparent in microscopic plants and animals and gradually affect more species in an increasing area, threatening species balance.[3]

In the Great Lakes these negative changes appeared initially in harbor and near-to-shore areas and only gradually affected some of the open waters. But the coastal zones are the most important for water supply spawning fish, and recreation. The worst effects of eutrophication were found in Erie.

One of the functions of the International Joint Commission, formed by the United States and Canada is to monitor Great Lakes water quality. In the Commission's 1976 report, there were more problem areas in Erie, than in Superior, Michigan and Huron combined. The flood of phosphorus generated massive algae blooms that rapidly settled to the bottom. The decaying matter put huge demands on dissolved oxygen in the water. Starting in 1950's, there was a summer collapse of dissolved oxygen, called anoxia, in Erie's central basin. The severity and extent of anoxia depend on climatic conditions, but anoxia worsened through the mid-70's. The deeper, colder waters are those most impacted and some fish in this region were gravely affected.

The blue pike was a favored Lake Erie fish which preferred the deeper waters. It became the victim of the most stunning species collapse in the history of the Great Lakes. In 1949, commercial fishermen took 23.8 million pounds from the lake. By 1962 it had virtually disappeared. The colonizing smelt may have played a part in this near-extinction, but the the process occurred during the years when anoxia became widespread in the central basin.

Lake Ontario is the ultimate recipient of the phosphorus accumulated upstream. But Ontario is better able than Erie to temper the effects of eutrophication due to its greater volume. Lake Michigan's Green Bay and Huron's Saginaw Bay also had major problems with dissolved oxygen and algae blooms.

One of the great joys of living near the lakes is the ready availability of recreation. But eutrophication rendered some areas undesirable or unusable. In fact, weeds in some parts of Lake Erie grew so thick that property values declined by 15 to 20 percent.[4]

Eutrophication is, at least in theory, a manageable problem. Control of nutrient loading can improve and eventually restore water quality. The United States and Canadian governments signed the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement in 1978 pledging themselves to control phosphorus through a variety of programs including greater municipal waste treatment and a reduction in the phosphorus content of household detergents. This, of course, was easier said than done.

THIRD STAGE: MICROCONTAMINANTS

Toxic chemicals reach the lakes from industrial discharges, urban runoff, hazardous waste sites, atmospheric deposition, and sediments previously loaded with chemicals.

The primary danger of many chemicals, particularly pesticides, results from bioaccumulation, whereby seemingly insignificant amounts of a substance keep concentrating as they progress through the food chain. A lake in California was sprayed with the chemical DDD to rid the area of midges. The mixture was .02 of one part per million (ppm) of water, the equivalent of a few drops in a railroad tank car. Thirteen months later it was discovered that there were 10 ppm in plankton, 903 ppm in the fat of plankton-eating fish, 2,690 ppm in the fat of carnivorous fish, and 2,134 ppm in the fat of fish-eating birds, which usually did not survive the experience. In short, the fish-eating birds ended up with a body-fat concentration 100,000 times greater than that of the original solution.[5]

In the Great Lakes, fish provided the first evidence of both the intensity and scope of the problem. In 1969, Lake Michigan salmon and trout were found to contain 11.8 and 19.2 ppm of DDT, respectively. This was far above the recommended food level of 5 ppm. Mercury levels were excessive in the St. Clair-Detroit river systems. From year to year and from one end of the Great Lakes to the other, new compounds were found in fish, water, and sediment. There was Mirex in Lake Ontario, heavy metals in Erie, dioxin in Huron, arsenic in Michigan, and PCB's everywhere.

In the Great Lakes, the herring gull, along with man, stands at the summit of the food chain. By the early 70's the birds seemed to be disappearing from Lake Ontario. It was discovered that gull eggs in the area had become so soft that a simple touch was sufficient to dent the shell. By the mid-70's, herring gulls were found to have concentrations of 16 pollutants, including DDT, Mirex, chlordane, and dieldrin. PCB's registered 3,530 ppm, 10 times the concentration of the next pollutant.[3] This was at a time when the safety of a 5-ppm edible fish standard was being debated.

There also was a direct connection between the degree of contamination and its effect on birds. In Lake Superior, nearly 80 percent of eggs hatched successfully, in Erie 63 percent, but in Ontario only 18.6 percent. In the worst areas, adult birds showed little interest in nesting or incubation.[6]

But which of these chemicals were dangerous to humans and at what levels of concentration? If substances were also being absorbed from the air and water, what was a safe level in fish? How much was being absorbed from other food sources? These were some of the trickier questions that assaulted a thin line of officials charged with protecting human health and the food supply in the Great Lakes.

Fisheries officials, for instance, were rather abruptly confronted by the plague of toxic substances. Certain species, generally the most desirable, were barred to commercial fishermen while contaminant levels remained high. In many areas, sport fishermen were warned not to eat large trout or salmon more than once a week. Pregnant women were told not to eat any. All of this caused enormous economic dislocation and threatened the multimillion dollar sport fishery.

What was to be done? There was evidence that stocked salmon and trout were restoring balance to the disrupted ecosystem. But how could public agencies justify the planting of fish that would cause an increasing health hazard as they grew larger. Previously depressed lakeside cities and villages had benefited greatly from the influx of sport fishermen. In most areas, a temporary decision was made to continue stocking and await the results of efforts to control toxic substances.

At first the results were encouraging. DDT was banned and mercury sources controlled. Strict controls were placed on PCB's. In each case there were initial, dramatic reductions in fish contamination; in less than 10 years even the largest fish were approaching levels considered "safe," although the definition of safe continued to be a matter of debate.

But it seemed that as danger from one chemical receded, two more were found to be dangerous. The dimensions of the problem began to take on nightmarish proportions. Officials spoke of the "seemingly perpetual discovery of new and unknown toxic substances in the Great Lakes" [7] and struggled to find a method of evaluating the relative dangers of these and existing chemicals.

With passage of the Toxic Substances Control Act in 1976, EPA made an inventory of chemical compounds. Focusing on the Great Lakes and using a new data bank, the agency found 3,000 compounds with the ability to persist or bioaccumulate. Of these 3,000, residues of about 450 were found in various parts of the Great Lakes basin.[8]

Struggling for a manageable starting point, the Human Health Committee of the International Joint Commission came up with about 400 "priority pollutants." [9] To add to their difficulties, it is estimated that 600 new chemicals are used or produced every year in the Great Lakes basin.

Until recently, priorities have been automatically established by crises—by a "chemical-of-the-year" posing a grave, immediate threat. Eventually, one must hope, control efforts will go beyond this point. There are formidable problems:

1. Regional variations. It may be that because of industrial techniques, waste treatment, or the geology of the area, some chemicals pose hazards in one area but not in another. This is particularly pertinent to the Great Lakes basin with its wide variations in soil depth, drainage, and other physical characteristics. How do you determine boundaries for a region? And how do you enforce a standard across state or national boundaries?

2. Combinations of chemicals. One may develop predictive skills for assessing the danger of an individual chemical, but in some rivers and harbors—such as many around the Great Lakes—there is a stew of dozens of chemicals and a resulting concern over synergistic or reinforcing effects.

3. Toxicity and accumulation. Some substances are toxic but do not accumulate; others may accumulate but have no immediate toxic effect. In the first instance immediate attention is required. In the second, careful, long-term observation is necessary to determine whether dangers exist.

4. Residual sources. This is the wild card. It is estimated that over 4,000 waste disposal sites in the basin[9] receive or have received the incredible variety of refuse generated by our society. Love Canal is the most spectacular example to date of the ugly surprises that can spring from negligent chemical disposal. Far more prosaic dumps also will leak or leach hazardous materials. Even if Superfund is eventually administered with integrity, it will deal only with the worst sites.

5. Airborne pollution. Acid rain has recently received heavy publicity. It is, however, not the only airborne water pollution of consequence. The atmosphere transports PCB's long distances from original sources and is believed to be the predominant source of PCB's in Michign and Superior. Of the total phosphorus moving into the basins of Lakes Superior, Michigan, and Huron, it is estimated that 37 percent, 26 percent, and 23 percent respectively, simply falls from the sky.[8] Much of the lead in Lake Michigan is from airborne deposition.

Isle Royale, a National Park in Lake Superior, is a pristine wilderness protected from permanent settlement and industrial development. Yet in an inland lake on the island, trout were found to have accumulations of the pesticide toxaphene that were greater than those in fish from the open waters of Superior.[3] Because there are no known manufacturers or users of toxaphene in the Great Lakes basin, it is suspected that the chemical is blown by winds from the South, where most toxaphene is used.

It is one thing to move against a clear and present danger, a single point source of pollution. It is another to control the activities of individuals and industries in various jurisdictions hundreds of miles away.

6. Translation of dats into regulations. What is dangerous? How much is dangerous? Where is the source of the danger? What should be done to eliminate it and how much would it cost? At each step those with vested interests in the status quo will challenge the regulatory process. Officials need to translate scientific findings into regulations that can be effectively enforced because the regulations retain the support of society as a whole, considering the interacting economics and politics involved.

THE LAKES TODAY

Superior remains the magnificent example of the oligotrophic lake. Its deep, pure waters—the headwaters of the Great Lakes system—have continually diluted the effects of abuses in other lakes. Therefore protection of Superior must be the cornerstone of any attempts to rehabilitate the system as a whole.

Superior may even be the extraordinary example of a lake that has recovered, actualy reversing earlier damage from the lumbering that stripped basin forests. The region has largely been spared eutrophication and toxic chemical problems. Further, the Superior region has been "blessed" with poor soil and a truly dismal climate; portions of the south shore rank close to Pacific rain forest areas in lack of annual sunlight. The coastline remains lightly populated, cities few and widely scattered, and farmlands relatively rare. There has actualy been a small decline in the types and levels of pollution indicators in the last 50 years, probably due to the return of the forests.

The biggest controversy in Superior to date has been over the dumping of taconite (iron) wastes into the waters off Silver Bay. Asbestos fibers in the waste materials were carried to nearby Duluth where they showed up in drinking water. The company responsible, Reserve Mining, contested the significance of the fibers. The case began in 1969 and dragged on until a federal court threatened to close the mining operation. Finally the court ordered secured land disposal by April, 1980. Duluth did not wait for the conclusion of this interminable case; it constructed a filtration plant to remove the fibers.

Michigan, the only lake completely within U.S. boundaries, has shown considerable improvement in some respects. The discharges of 12 municipal waste treatment plants and one major industry on the Indiana coast have been diverted from the basin. Green Bay has been the focus of a major rehabilitation effort and some improvements are noted, though total phosphorus loading into the lake remains well above the goal set in the 1978 Water Quality Agreement.

It is chiefly with toxic chemicals that major problems remain. PCB's remain above agreement standards. The continued difficulty of lake trout in reestablishing themselves in Michigan and the other lakes is increasingly felt to involve both PCB's and DDT. After a rapid decline, levels of DDT appear to have stabilized above agreement standards. More alarming, however, is the increase in dieldrin.

In short, there has been major progress in some of the worst areas of Lake Michigan, but the overall problem of chemicals remains. It is important that cleanup efforts continue, for the lake has a special problem. Separated from the mainflow of the lake system, Michigan may take up to a century to completely replace existing waters.

By contrast, the major problem area of Huron—Saginaw Bay—has a flushing rate of less than 200 days. It is here that some rapid improvement in phosphate levels has led to declining levels of algae and improved drinking water. The overall water quality of Huron is second only to that of Superior. The most disturbing problem is that of dioxin. According to the 1981 IJC report, dioxin levels in herring gull colonies are close to six times those found in other lakes.[10]

Erie receives the inflowing Huron waters via the St. Clair River and Lake and the waters of Detroit. In the St. Clair River, 84 organic compounds have been detected. Traces of 17 of these have been discovered in drinking water samples from three cities on the Canadian shoreline. These findings are highly disturbing and suggest that "the state of the Great Lakes system regarding organic pollution may be more degraded overall than previously believed . . ." [10]

The suffocating effects of phosphorous continue to be felt throughout Erie. Though concentrations have been declining since 1978, they remain far above target levels. Dissolved oxygen continues below target levels. It may be that so much phosphorus has accumulated in bottom sediments that recovery will take longer than originally estimated.

In Lake Ontario, the baseline levels of all chemicals are higher than anywhere else in the Great Lakes. The deepwater sculpin, a forage fish, has nearly disappeared from the lake. It had never been exploited by the commercial fishery and declined during a period when its major predators were greatly reduced. It is considered possible that the waters of the lake have become so toxic that some species simply cannot reproduce.[11]

Dioxin has been found in Ontario fish. Waste disposal along the Niagara River has been blamed.[12]

In the Great Lakes system as a whole there has been considerable progress in controlling eutrophication. As various new municipal treatment systems begin operation, this recovery should continue. In some areas, however, it may be checked by the continued introduction of phosphorus from farmlands; high density row crops, in particular have been identified as a major source of phosphorus.

Toxic substances remain the most intractable problem. Even so, sharp declines have occurred after controls were instituted. There are indications, however, that levels of some have reached a plateau. The continuing threat lies in the incredible number of potentially dangerous substances; the wide variety of ways they can enter the lake system; and the time lag between their introduction and the discovery of advese effects.

In three areas the process of contamination has reached the point where, as an EPA official said, ". . . even though all remedial measures have been or are being taken, it is doubtful whether the environmental problems will be completely resolved and uses restored." [13] Two of these areas are the Cuyahoga River in Cleveland and Hamilton Harbor in Ontario. The third, the Grand Calumet River/Indiana Harbor Canal, contains one of the highest concentrations of pollutants and heavy metals in the lakes. There are no plans to deal with current problems there and the state of Indiana has moved to designate the waters as "limited use zones" suitable only for industrial and municipal discharges.

In seven other Great Lakes areas, no programs are planned to solve major pollution problems and restore them to full use.

There are genuine doubts whether we have the overall ability to control toxic pollutants—not to mention the will necessary to control them. It is possible that the concept of "industrial zones" or "restricted use zones" may erode the commitment in the Water Quality Agreement to "restore and enhance water quality" and to "prevent further pollution of the Great Lakes basin ecosystem."

REBOUND

Smelt were originally planted in the state of Michigan to provide food for stocked salmon. The salmon didn't make it but the smelt prospered with a vengeance. They escaped from their original home, an inland lake, and moved into the main body of Michigan and thence to Huron, Superior, and Erie. Populations exploded, with the commercial catch in Lake Michigan rising from 86,000 pounds in 1931 to 4.2 million in 1940. The massive spawning runs, pouring up streams in the basin, became a major event of the spring season. Along the Menominee River a Smelt Carnival was an annual event complete with rides, concessions, and a wrestling match held in a foot of dead fish. In some years individual dipnet catches may have matched or exceeded the commercial harvest. Suddenly in the winter of 1942-43 an infectious disease all but wiped out the new fish. But with amazing resilience, it rebounded to levels near its former abundance.

SCIENTISTS DISTURBED BY FISH CANCER FINDINGS

In what has been called a "crucial experiment," sediments from a river flowing into Lake Erie has been found capable of causing cancer in fish. This sediment, and that from another Erie tributary, have produced cancers in mice.

In testimony before a House subcommittee in September, a number of scientists revealed that six species of fish, from five locations in the United States, were found to have an exceedingly high incidence of cancers.[14] In all five areas, three of them in the Great Lakes basin, the human mortality rates from all types of cancer is higher than the U.S. average. At two of the Great Lakes sites, the incidence of digestive tract malignancies is significantly higher than the nationwide average.

Dr. John J. Black, a cancer research scientist at Roswell Park Memorial Institute in Buffalo, found liver and skin cancer to be epidemic among bullheads in the Buffalo River. He also discovered abnormal cell growth in six other species. Analysis of the Buffalo River sediments revealed several known carcinogens.

Completing what a colleague termed "a circle of proof," Black induced skin and liver cancer in previously healthy fish with extracts of these sediments.

Black, in collaboration with Dr. Paul Baumann, performed the same experiment with sediments from the Black River in Ohio. These were found capable of producing cancers in mice. In fact, the Black River sediment extract proved more carcinogenic to mice than a known, potent, cancer-causing agent, benzo(a)pyrene, which was used as a positive control in the experiment.

Bullheads taken from the Black were found to have "30 percent prevalence of grossly detectable cancers." In fish above three years of age the total reached nearly 100 percent when microscopically discovered cancerous and pre-cancerous liver conditions were included.

Black's findings are believed to be the first direct experimental evidence that tumors in wild fish species are a result of exposure to contaminants in the waterways. He does not believe these are isolated examples and feels that similar results could be obtained by competent investigators in waters near heavy industrialized or urbanized areas.

These findings are particularly disturbing in view of the fact that fish and mammals utilize similar metabolic pathways to eliminate chemical pollutants. It may be that, in certain geographic regions, fish are getting cancer for the same reason as humans.

Early coal miners used caged canaries as "sentinel" animals to warn of unseen and potentially deadly methane gas. Quite by accident, fish already have served as sentinels and may have helped to prevent many human cancers. In the late 1950's and early 1960's, there was a worldwide epidemic of liver cancer in hatchery-raised rainbow trout. It was found that a mold, growing on peanuts used in a new trout food, produced aflotoxins, one of the most potent known carcinogens. This discovery led to Food and Drug Administration standards for controlling aflotoxins in human foods.

Fish cancers similar to those found in the Great Lakes have also been found to be epidemic in Puget Sound, the Hudson River, and Torch Lake in Michigan.

DIOXIN LEVELS

The Saginaw Bay commercial fishery on Lake Huron regularly ships carp to the Chinese and Jewish markets of major cities. Carp is a major ingredient in gefillite fish. In 1983, it was widely reported that fish reaching this market might be contaminated with dioxin.

The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) recommends that fish containing 25 to 50 parts per trillion (ppt) dioxin be eaten no more than once a week. In 1979, fish from throughout southern Michigan were found to contain traces of dioxin ranging from 17 to 586 ppt, with most averaging 100 to 200 ppt.[15]

These findings also received belated publicity in the spring of 1983—probably because of the hullabaloo surrounding report of dioxin contamination at Times Beach, Missouri, and Midland, Michigan. Sales of carp from Saginaw Bay dropped 80 percent. Even though whitefish were free of dioxin, prices for it dropped by onehalf.[16]

The entire controversy took another twist when FDA testing in May 1983 found Saginaw Bay carp to be in the "safe" range of 20 to 24 ppt. The sequence of events is rather strange; dioxin levels of 1978 generated publicity only in 1983 after contaminant levels apparently registered significant declines.

GREAT LAKES NEED WISE DISPUTE RESOLUTIONS

(By Tom Kuchenberg)

The politics of scarcity have come with a vengeance to the Great Lakes, an enormous resource of enormous importance to the nation. One in every three Canadians and one in every seven U.S. citizens—36 million people in all—live in the basin. During the last 200 years the lakes have been used for food, fresh water (for homes, farms, and industry), transportation, power generation, recreation, and waste disposal. The region has felt the impacts, too, of intensive agriculture, heavy industry, and tourism.

It was long felt that the huge volune of water in the five lakes was sufficient to accommodate all of these activities. The realization that this is not the case has pitted user groups against one another, with each group trying to show that its activities provide the greatest public benefit. There also is a growing awareness that the entire region competes with other regions for economic and natural resources.

These battles have become increasingly involved. Adversaries on one issue may be allies on another. The commercial, sport, and Indian fishermen compete for primacy in harvesting the fish of the lakes. At the same time they join forces on pollution issues. This group is in turn joined by industries in establishing a united front against water transfers.

The competing interests battle one another in legislatures, administrative hearings, courts, and the press. Disputes may last for decades, with even apparently simple issues becoming highly complex. Nothing illustrates this better than the seemingly straightforward question of fishing rights.

THE FISHERIES

Over a century and a half, the commercial fishermen of a Great Lakes developed a unique lifestyle featuring a fierce independence. Until the 1950's, they reigned supreme on the open waters. The cities of the shoreline enjoyed, during the world wars and the Great Depression, diets supplemented by inexpensive fish. This fact was recognized by the Michigan legislature when it officially commended the industry for contributions during World War II.

Twenty years later, however, Michigan was moving to severely limited commercial operations. New and powerful economic interests had developed around sport fishing. These argued that commercial overfishing had destroyed or greatly depleted the stocks of desirable species.

Michigan's action inspired similar measures in other states, notably Illinois and Ohio. Techniques, usually devised by state resource departments, varied from place to place. They included quotas, gear specifications, licensing, and restrictions on species, season, and fish size. Michigan adopted a formula for buying out many commercial licenses. Illinois told 14 of its 48 licensed fishermen they would have to compete in a lottery; only three operators were chosen and they were assigned quotas. There was no suggestion of compensation for those eliminated.[1]

Commercial interests, notably in Wisconsin and the upper peninsula of Michigan, initiated a series of political and legal challenges to the new policy. Widespread coverage of these clashes highlighted the growing value of the fisheries and induced another group to enter the struggle: Indians.

During the 1970's, Indian tribes challenged state authority, particularly fish and game restrictions, all across the United States. The tribes proved to have a remarkably strong card—federal treaties, some of which specifically provided hunting and fishing rights. Other treaties were not so clear. Essentially, treaty rights were pitted against state powers of regulation. A series of Indian suits inspired countersuits by sports interests. Michigan courts upheld the rights for individual bands of Indians on a case-by-case basis.

In April 1973, the Department of Justice moved for a broader-based determination by filing suit against the state of Michigan. Much of the Indian fishing would be commercial. Central to the case against these operations was the assertion that in the past they had been the major cause of the decline in desirable species and would endanger attempts to establish new salmon and trout stocks. The Indians argued that their activities would be controlled. In separate cases, remaining non-Indian operators insisted that other factors were responsible for the earlier collapse of major species.

In fact, Michigan's resource agency had changed its view in the matter. In 1958, officials stated flatly that overfishing had not caused the near-obliteration of the lake trout. Blame was placed on the invading sea lamprey, a ravenous predator.[2] Thirteen years later it was asserted that new fishing technology, notably nylon nets, had been "a major factor in the collapse of lake trout stocks."[3]

Sport fishing generates enormous revenues for the state and for recreation interests. But there has been difficulty evaluating the consequences of commercial fishing and defining the term "resource depletion." At a 1978 congressional hearing Howard Tanner, then director of the Department of Natural Resources (DNR), stated:

"You see, depletion of the resource is not strictly a biological point. That is what I take at issue; because it is so very important . . . when you destroy a recreational fish worth $80 for the purpose of selling it at $1.25, to the point where the charter boat fisherman could no longer operate, a motel can no longer fill, the boats are no longer sold, then that, in effect, is effective depletion and I am afraid people are going to miss that point."[4]

In July 1979, a federal court granted the Indians the right to fish free of state regulations in treaty areas.[5] But Michigan continued to challenge the Indians who operated under regulations originally drawn up by the federal government. From April 1981 to the present, the Interior Department has attempted to mediate a settlement. The idea is to limit Indian control to areas north of the 45th parallel and permit them half the allowable harvest of the prized whitefish, chubs, and incidentally, lake trout. Certain zones, including crucial spawning areas, would be off limits to all fishermen.

Efforts to reach a final settlement are complicated by the emotions involved. It is difficult for people not living near these areas to understand the fury generated by this issue. There have been incidents of violence and, reportedly, the federal judge currently overseeing the dispute has threatened to place federal marshals on board Indian licensed vessels to protect them.

The situation in Canada is a startling contrast. Not only have the federal and provincial governments refused to impose major restrictions on commercial fishing, they have subsidized various aspects of the industry. As an Ontario government publication states:

". . . Both the federal and provincial governments assist the industry in developing more efficient economical gear and handling techniques. Joint ventures between government and industry have resulted in the adoption of the otter trawl, the development of a fish meal plant, the development of a bulk handling technique for smelt and numerous exploratory fishing operations throughout the Great Lakes."[6]

All of these factors have combined to create a robust industry which exports a sizable portion of its catch to the United States. In 1981, from the four lakes shared by the U.S. and Ontario, Canadians harvested nearly 56 million pounds of Great Lakes fish as opposed to the U.S. total of 14 million pounds.

The fisheries conflict symbolizes the lack of unity that has plagued the Great Lakes basin. Between 1883 and 1941, before the rise of sport fishing, 27 interstate or international conferences were held with the aim of coordinating regulations. Basically, all were failures. Tentative agreements floundered on differing state priorities.

The contrast between the U.S. and Canada demonstrates how resource pressure colors management attitudes. The consensus among scienists appears to be that fishing is one of several factors that can harm stock but that it has, as one puts it, "seldom been clearly indicted in the collapse of Great Lakes fish stocks."[7] There is growing evidence that deteriorating water quality has played a key role.

CONTAMINANTS

It seems that every year in the past decade, public attention around the Great Lakes has been captured by a "new" chemical pollutant. In 1983, there could be no doubt that this chemical was dioxin.

Dow Chemical Co., with a major plant at Midland, announced a $3 million program designed to allay fears over dioxin.[8] The American Medical Association denounced the news media for mounting a "witch hunt" against the chemical and announced a campaign to counter "irrational reaction."[9] Less than two weeks later a representative of the AMA was denouncing the denunciation. Calling the language of the resolution "imprudent," the spokesman added. "I believe we have a potential health problem."[10]

What is going on? It is no wonder, with experts backtracking and sidestepping, that the public is confused. There are actually several matters at issue. Is dioxin in trace amounts dangerous? What form of exposure is dangerous? Is what is being labeled dioxin actually dioxin?

How could quantities of any substance as minute as parts per trillion be considered dangerous? It is laboratory experiments on animals, including primates, that has alarmed researchers. For example, in one University of Wisconsin study, eight female rhesus monkeys were fed 550 ppt of dioxin per day for nine months. The animals developed disorders that began with loss of hair and ended with hemorrhaging, cellular changes, and organ enlargement. Five of the eight animals died during or shortly after the experiment.[11]

Indeed Dow itself was concerned with effects. In the mid-60's an outbreak of the skin disease chloracne at a Dow plant led a company official to commission experiments on the skin of human beings. The tests were performed on paid prison volunteers by a Pennsylvania dermatologist. There are approximately 75 dioxin compounds. TCDD, used in the tests, is widely regarded as the most potent. A Dow official cautioned the dermatologist that TCDD was "highly toxic" and that small doses were fatal to laboratory animals who showed evidence of severe liver and kidney damage.

Follow-up testing of the prison volunteers could have helped answer questions about dioxin's effects on humans, but no records were kept of the prisoners' identities and efforts by the EPA to locate them have failed.[12] Some researchers believe that the effect of dioxin exposure may not appear for years. Others state that while ingestion of the chemical is dangerous, the effects of skin exposure are transient.

In this country primary responsibility for such an assessment falls to the Environmental Protection Agency. But EPA research funds have been cut sharply. Because of this and constantly changing priorities, confirmation testing has been delayed three years. Critics of the EPA have said that the real reason for the delay is government fear about implications for the Agent Orange issue. Agent Orange, which contains dioxin, was sprayed widely in Vietnam to defoliate trees. Any determination of potential damage from the substance would result in increased demands for compensation from ex-servicemen. The head of EPA research and development, Courtney Riordan, has said, "We're not in charge. We're like a waiter in a restaurant."[13] In other words, his section does as it is told by agency heads.

From 1981 to the spring of 1983, individuals either indifferent or hostile to environmental goals occupied top positions in the EPA. The behavior of these officials resulted in the scandal that swept the agency and led to the departure of more than 20 appointees, including Administrator Anne Burford. Of the irregularities investigated by six congressional committees, two centered on the Great Lakes.

In the summer of 1981, EPA personnel prepared a report that identified Dow Chemical as the major source of dioxin contamination in two Michigan Rivers, the Saginaw and Tittawabasee, that flow into Saginaw Bay. Gulls in the area contain the highest concentration of dioxin in the Great Lakes. Dow dumps at least 30 million gallons of waste water per day into rivers entering the bay.[14]

EPA wishes to examine the waste as it leaves some of the manufacturing processes. After waste is treated, mixed with other materials, or diluted in streams, analysis is much more difficult because of lower concentrations and the tendency of some compounds to "hide" similar substances.

Dow refuses to allow this on-site investigation, on the basis that its competitors may deduce trade secrets from the results. EPA feels that this objection should be raised only if and when there is a request to release the results of an analysis. The matter is presently in federal court.

The study in question was an internal management document. The work of several researchers, describing how they had come to their conclusions, had not yet been added when the report was forwarded to Washington, D.C. The circumstances surrounding its premature delivery to Washington and subsequent presentation to the Canadian press are among subjects of a current congressional investigation.

In March 1983, Valdus Adamkus, head of EPA's Chicago regional office, testified before a House subcommittee that deputy administrator John Hernandez "angrily denounced the report and called the report of our regional people trash,"[15] Adamkus also said that another EPA official, John Todhunter, insisted that a component of the report—an Oregon study that connected dioxin with cancer, miscarriages, and birth defects—be eliminated. Todhunter also demanded, according to Adamkus, that references to Dow as the source of the chemical be deleted and ordered Adamkus to meet with Dow officials. A scientist in the Chicago office testified before the same subcommittee that during a conference phone call, "Dow officials went page by page with us through the document starting with the title,"[15]

The Chicago officials had other tales of questionable behavior. The United States and Canada had pledged to minimize eutrophication by controlling the amount of phosphorus entering the lakes. One of the provisions of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement called for reduction of phosphorus in household detergents to 0.5 percent by weight " . . . or to meet local conditions, whichever are more stringent."

Wisconsin had banned the use of phosphorus in detergents and Adamkus praised the measure in September 1981. He testified that he was told by his superiors a month later not to testify in favor of a similar ban being considered in Ohio. In March 1982, he said, Hernandez ordered him to meet with officials of a company manufacturing phosphorus and sign a letter they would be carrying.

Wisconsin was considering extending its ban on phosphorus and the company wanted to head off EPA support. Adamkus, apparently to avoid total control, said he wrote his own letter. This letter stressing voluntary limits on detergent phosphates, was reviewed and approved by the company officials. A week later, by two votes, the Wisconsin State Assembly voted against continuing the ban.[16]

These highly objectionable procedures could be considered violations of the spirit if not the letter of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement and it calls for strict phosphate controls.

While its record is better, Canada appears not to be immune to industry pressure. Contaminants from pulp and paper facilities have been reduced on both sides of the border. From 1967 to 1980, however, U.S. operations have recorded an impressive decrease of over 90 percent, compared to 55 percent for the Canadians.[17] The difference is attributed by some to the prominent role played by the industry in the economy of Ontario.

Further, there is the Canadian penchant for secrecy. Harold Harvey, a professor at the University of Toronto, has written:

"Within environment Canada unnecessary secrecy surrounds much of the data on the environment. This is viewed as a major constraint in the search for understanding of the effects of contaminants on the aquatic environment . . . Thus when the International Joint Commission was refused data on contaminants in Great Lakes fishes, it was obliged to launch a costly and not altogether satisfactory alternative study of contaminants in fish-eating birds and mammals." [18]

These events illustrate the often intense opposition of some industries to environmental controls which, in conjunction with the scientific complexities and uncertainties associated with toxic chemicals, portend great difficulty in protecting the Great Lakes. Opposition to controls has intensified with the current recession. More properly called a depression in parts of the Great Lakes, the economic decline has struck at the region's aging basic industries. Already burdened corporations often claim that environmental improvements will force them to lay-offs, bankruptcy, or relocation. Fearful of losing their jobs, workers often adopt the company positions.

It is particularly insidious when those directly responsible for major problems and dangers are able to intimidate the enforcing agencies. In addition, as EPA's new administrator, William Ruckelshaus, has made clear, those corporations and officials supporting or at least willing to recognize the necessity of pollution controls are undermined. Worse, their environmental expenditures may put them at a competitive disadvantage.[19] At a minimum, therefore, the public has a right to demand fairness and integrity from the regulating agency.

DIVERSIONS

Any major transfers of resources from one region to another has always been a potentially explosive issue. Large-scale water diversion has usually been associated with the West. Yet in the past several years, the issue has generated increasing publicity and debate in the Great Lakes region.

Actually, water diversions have been a feature of the Great Lakes since 1829, when the first version of the Welland Canal opened navigation between Lakes Erie and Ontario by bypassing Niagara Falls. Of the five major diversions in the region, three carry water to or from the Great Lakes Basin. The Long Lac and Ogoki projects, built in the 1940's primarily for hydroelectric power, move water from the James Bay watershed into Lake Superior. The Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal takes water from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi via the Illinois Waterway.

High water in the Great Lakes increases power capacity by delivering greater volume and pressure to generators. In addition, it is the depth of rivers and channels connecting the lakes that determines how much cargo can be hauled. Admiral Paul E. Trimble, president of the Lake Carriers' Association, has stated that a one-inch drop in water level means 200 tons less cargo capacity in larger vessels.[20] Considering that some of the Great Lakes vessels make 50 trips per year, that inch translates to 10,000 tons per vessel each shipping season. However, low water benefits coastal and recreational property owners because of reduced erosion and increased beach areas.

The rate of flow at the Chicago outlet has been the subject of a controversy that has made round trips to the Supreme Court since the early 1920's. Currently the amount that can be taken by Chicago, 3,200 cubic feet per second (cfs), is controlled by a 1967 decision of the court.

Contrary to local myth, the net effect of current diversions is extremely small. By contrast, natural fluctuations are considerable. Lake levels, because of differences in basin precipitation and evaporation, vary from year to year. Historically, the difference between extreme high and extreme low water has ranged from 3.8 feet on Superior to 6.6 feet on Ontario.

In order to determine if the extreme levels could be regulated by increasing or decreasing diversion, a study was commissioned by the U.S. and Canada in 1977.[21] A study board also was charged with projecting future water needs in the basin and determining their effect on lake levels. Since it was regarded as impractical to increase flows into Superior, the study concentrated on manipulating levels at Chicago and within the system.

With one exception—a change put into effect during the course of the study—the board found changes in diversion rates to be detrimental. Under six models studied, net losses ranged from $2.8 to $69 million per year. Under the $69 million scenario, coastal zone residents gained $6 million and recreational users $8 million. The losers, however, lost big; recreational boating $1.8 million, navigation $13.8 million, and power interests $61.3 million.

Perhaps the biggest surprise of the study was the projection that growth in the basin would cause water consumption to double from 1975 to 2000 and triple from the 2000 level by 2035. These changes would result in a drop in lake levels.

The results of this study alone make it seem unlikely that the Great Lakes would be the target of large-scale diversions to other areas. There are, however, many other problems. A preliminary study has projected the cost of diverting 10,000 cfs from the western end of Lake Superior to the Missouri River. The estimate is $19.6 billion for the diversion system plus $7 billion for power plants to drive it, a staggering $26.6 billion total.[22]

Then there is the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. Under this agreement, Canada must approve any significant transfer of water from the basin. They are almost certain to veto any major diversion proposal. Further, the Reagan Administration has announced its intention to shift an increasing amount of irrigation cost to beneficiaries, thereby removing subsidies that favor construction.

Despite all this, people not given to undue anxiety are concerned. William Gianelli, assistant secretary for the Army of civil works, has stated:

"I think as time goes on, there are going to be designs on this area, and certainly I think the time is now ripe for you to bind together and collectively bring your views together and certainly take those measures which are necessary for the protection of this area."[20]

To begin with, there is the Ogallala Aquifer. It is an 800-mile-long natural reservoir that has permitted intensive farming in the Great Plains. Some 200,000 wells tap the Ogallala to irrigate 16 million acres of prime farmland. Forty percent of the nation's beef cattle are raised in the area. Comprising no less than 20 percent of the nation's irrigated acreage, the region also produces much of the country's feed grains, corn sorghum, and wheat.

The Ogallala is being exhausted. Not at a uniform rate, because it is not a uniform body. The water table has dropped 10 to 15 feet in some areas. In parts of the northern panhandle of Texas, failing farms are already a reality. Here the aquifer is shallow, evaporation fierce, and rainwater recharge limited.

Conditions are totally different in the northern areas of the aquifer. It is predicted that by 2020, 4.6 million irrigating acres, primarily in the southern plains, will have been forced to cease irrigation. Nonetheless, it is estimated that by that year there will be 3.8 million more irrigated acres than at present, the result of a massive expansion in Nebraska. After this peak, rapid and widespread exhaustion of the Ogallala could follow.[22]

Long before that there is likely to be tremendous political pressure from areas facing economic dislocation because of water shortages. For diversion has been used for more than irrigation; as in the case of Los Angeles, much urban and industrial development has clustered around transported water.

Another factor is a loophole in the Boundary Waters Treaty. Lake Michigan is totally within the United States and, except for navigation, not included. And there is the existing diversion from Michigan to the Mississippi River. Leaders of the province of Ontario are well aware of the potential danger. Alan Pope, minister of natural resources, said:

"From our standpoint, Chicago is sort of a 'wild card.' Its curious position provides the potential for unilateral U.S. withdrawal of waters from the system, bypassing the processes of balancing interests and uses implicit in the International Joint Commission."[23]

When people think of water transport from the Great Lakes, many picture a stainless-steel pipe careening across the countryside, the result of a grand project conceived and developed on a continental scale. Far more likely is a chain reaction. For instance, the Ogallala may be recharged from one system, that system from the Mississippi, and the Mississippi from the Great Lakes. With each link a separate project, enormous costs might be hidden and spread over time.

The $26.6 billion estimated cost of diverting water from western Lake Superior may also be misleading. Jonathon Bulkley, one of the authors of the study, notes that it was set in motion by other studies on possible recharge of the Ogallala via the Missouri. The premise of Bulkley's study was that Lake Superior water could theoretically restore the 10,000 cfs taken from the Missouri for the Ogallala. But if the Mississippi were to be recharged for the same purpose, costs would fall dramatically. In fact, the Chicago diversion has historically accommodated 10,000 cfs and has a present ability to divert 8,700 cfs with little or no extra cost if environmental dislocations are not taken into account. Bulkley has also taken part in a study that looked at a theoretical diversion going south from just east of Cleveland to the Ohio River. Preliminary cost estimates come to $3.2 billion. It is important to remember that cost has seldom played a definitive role in the development of water projects. The legendary Senator Robert Kerr of Oklahoma was possessed of a dream of constructing an ocean port in that state. Reputedly he was powerful enough to achieve this ambition. The Garrison Dam now under construction will divert water from the Missouri system to a Canadian watershed. The IJC has stated that the project, costing $1.3 billion, would injure health and property in Canada.[24]

The chief aim of Garrison is to create a system of lakes and canals that will irrigate 250,000 acres, primarily for the growing of wheat. Yet the Administration has declared against costly water projects; the Canadians are opposed; and farmers are being supplied with surplus wheat in return for reducing production of that crop. But construction continues.

The gimmick in many irrigation projects is subsidy through interest-free financing and repayment provisions that may stretch to half a century.

Recent Supreme Court decisions have cast considerable doubt on the ability of states, acting by themselves, to prohibit diversions beyond their boundaries. For much of this century the court appeared to hold that state law could regard water as a special resource and not an article of interstate commerce.

This concept was rejected last year in Sporhase v. Nebraska.[25] Nebraska had passed a statute requiring a state permit for interstate transport of groundwater. As one of the conditions for granting this permit, Nebraska demanded that the state into which water was to be exported allow reciprocal transfers. It was this provision the court regarded as a barrier to interstate commerce.

Although at one point in its opinion the court referred to state claims of water ownership as a "legal fiction," it later emphasized legitimate state interests in conservation of scarce supplies. But it seems likely that conservation arguments from the water-rich region would not be regarded with the same sympathy as those coming from semi-arid prairies. Thus it appears that any attempts by Great Lakes states to claim unequivocal ownership of water or to place an outright ban on diversions would be regarded as discriminatory under this interpretation of the commerce clause.

There are some options available to the lake states. They might be able to impose a substantial water severance tax on all users outside the basin. As a revenue measure such a tax on coal has been held legitimate. The crucial point is that the interstate and intrastate importers beyond the basin would have to be treated equally.

Lake states also might enact a law imposing strict liability for damage to downstream riparian owners. Here the IJC study of diversions would be extremely useful as a guide to the types and amounts of possible losses. There is also the possibility of a user priority system which, in times of shortage, could prefer basin users over outside importers.[26]

In framing any statutes, the lake states would be well advised to keep in mind standards the Supreme Court has set for determining the validity of state laws regulating natural resources:

"Where the statute regulates evenhandedly to effectuate a legitimate local public interest, and its effects on interstate commerce are only incident, it will be upheld unless the burden imposed on such commerce is clearly excessive in relation to the putative local benefits. If a legitimate local purpose is found, then the question becomes one of degree, and the extent of the burden that will be tolerated will of course depend on the nature of the local interest involved, and on whether it could be promoted as well with a lesser impact on interstate activities."[27]

Finally, any of the state measures discussed above might inspire federal action or become the nucleus of a revised Great Lakes compact. Legislation was in fact introduced by Senator Charles Percy (R-Ill.) on October 28, 1983 that would prohibit diversion of Great Lakes water beyond bordering states unless approved by all other states and the IJC. It would also prohibit any federal agency from even studying such a transfer without similar approval.[28]

Alternatively, a revised Great Lakes compact, negotiated among basin states and approved by Congress, also would bear the imprint of federal law. Supplemented by an agreement of understanding with Canada, a compact may be the best method of protecting the lakes. If history is a guide, the only time an area of origin has any leverage is prior to a diversion. It is therefore important that coordinated positions be developed at the earliest possible time.

Historically, however, lack of unity has plagued attempts at coordination. In order to bring about a strong compact, the lake states will have to muster a new discipline and a new appreciation of the unique resource they long took for granted.

In sum, one might conclude (1) that large-scale diversions from the Great Lakes are at present economically and politically irrational, (2) that rationality has not always played a noticeable role in water policy, and (3) that if scientists are correct about the likelihood of long-lasting drought in the plains, pressures for tapping the Great Lakes may eventually become irresistible.

CONTROLS ON THE FARM

Limitations on the phosphorus content in detergents, municipal wastewater, and industrial discharges will not be sufficient to control eutrophication in Lake Erie. In order to restore the water quality of the lake to an acceptable level, agricultural sources also must be reduced. To this end, a number of federal agencies have developed pilot programs to control run-off of fertilizers.

The program has provided farmers with planting equipment and technical assistance for 10- to 20-acre demonstration plots. Such projects are now under way in all counties of Erie's western basin. It is estimated that fully 80 percent of the U.S. Erie watershed is suitable for some form of conservation tillage and 53 percent for no-till operations.[29]

Development of the program involved a conscious effort by EPA to avoid strict and possibly unenforceable farm regulations. Federal funding of the demonstration projects follows a decade of EPA support for local conservation districts involved in searching for ways to control agricultural pollution.

First results are encouraging. Yields from the demonstration fields have been as good or better than county averages. Because of reduced labor, energy and capital costs, some farmers may save money by reducing tillage. It is estimated that in some counties with suitable soils, net farm income could increase by more than $4 per acre.[30]

Expansion of the program will include demonstrations of other conservation techniques such as ridge-till. The benefits to Lake Erie from these demonstrations could be great. If widely adopted, conservation planting could reduce erosion by up to 50 percent in the eastern basin and up to 70 percent in the western.

CONTINENTAL DIVIDE

Inland lakes in areas of thin, stony soils are particularly vulnerable to acid rain. The Canadian Shield, which underlies much of the northern Great Lakes basin, is such an area. Yet the acid rain problem has become a chronic source of conflict in relations between the United States and Canada. After years of debate, it is now believed by a majority of scientists that reduction of sulfur dioxide emissions is likely to result in a roughly comparable reduction of acid precipitation. And the United States does not deny the Canadian claim that 50 percent of sulfur emissions in eastern Canada's atmosphere comes from this country.

When William Ruckelshaus was named EPA Administrator last May, hopes were raised for swift development of a plan to control acid rain. Canadian Ambassador Alan Gottlieb was given a seat of honor at Ruckelshaus' swearing-in ceremony. President Reagan had characterized the problem as one of immediate concern and pointedly told the new Administrator to "tackle acid rain." [31]

But prospects for an early agreement were abruptly and indefinitely postponed in October, evidently because the Reagan cabinet is at loggerheads over the multi-billion dollar cost of a solution. Ruckelshaus, who had hoped to formulate a U.S. position in time for a meeting in Halifax, stated that the issue "divides the country along sectional lines." [32]

The meeting did, however, produce additional agreement on control of eutrophication. In a supplement to the Water Quality Agreement, the countries agreed to maintain the quality of Superior and Huron waters by limiting phosphorus discharges from large municipal waste treatment plants. The United States acknowledged responsibility for the bulk of further phosphorus reductions in Lake Erie. The options for meeting goals include programs to control agricultural sources. The two countries will meet within the next year to allocate similar reductions for Lake Ontario.

RESEARCH MONEY DISPUTED

The constantly renewed battle over Great Lakes research facilities has ended with United States programs largely intact. This year, for a change, administrators even had the advantage of knowing their level of funding for the 1984 fiscal year before it started on October 1. The powerful Office of Management and Budget had proposed chopping the Great Lakes laboratories' budget from $2.5 million to $1.5 million. Congressional delegations from the lake region led a successful fight to restore the $2.5 million figure.

In fiscal 1980, the appropriation was more than $3.5 million. The Reagan Administration sought for several years to terminate all funding directed specifically at Great Lakes water quality problems, but Congress demurred.

Cuts had been proposed in spite of U.S. treaty obligations to Canada under the two nations' Water Quality Agreement. Research is a prerequisite to any meaningful progress toward treaty goals. In its 1982 report, the International Joint Commission expressed concern over the "implications of these budget cuts on the United States' ability to meet its Agreement obligations." [33]

A still-evolving proposal in the Province of Ontario may, however, seriously affect Great Lakes research contributed by Canada. It is not widely known in the United States that much of the major, long-term research has been conducted by Ontario. Pressed by economic difficulties similar to those of the U.S. lake states, the province is considering budget reductions for its Department of Forestry, Fishery and Wildlife. Such cuts could seriously affect six or more laboratories with Great Lakes work.

Provincial spokesmen stress their continuing commitment to research and the possibility of using facilities outside the government. But others in the province doubt that the current effort and quality of work could be sustained. Henry Regier, a Canadian member of the Great Lakes Fishery Commission, feels that the proposed cuts "would certainly be detrimental to the long-term rehabilitation prospects of the Great Lakes with respect to both fisheries and water quality."

THE CHANCELLOR OF GERMANY VISITS ISRAEL: THE SPIRIT OF RECONCILIATION AND THE NEED FOR THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last month the Chancellor of West Germany, Helmut Kohl, visited Israel. He is only the second German head of state to do so since the Jewish State was founded. It was clearly a painful meeting for both parties.

Modern Germany must live with the memory of its role as the perpetrator of the most barbaric act of genocide in modern history, and Israel survives as a nation besieged. Besieged physically, in a sea of hostile neighbors, and spiritually as the homeland of a people persecuted beyond the limits of human tolerance.

Yet the visit of Chancellor Kohl stands as a noble effort at reconciliation. It is a manifestation, in the words of Kohl, of the bridge built between our two countries and people across the abyss of the past.

Some would no doubt prefer that the bridge be burned, that a reconciliation never be reached. Some legislators boycotted the Chancellor's speech in front of the Israeli Parliament. "Don't forget, don't forgive!" exhorted one demonstrator's hand-lettered sign.

Yet few will question the assertion that in view of today's tense global situation, the international community must move in the direction of mutual cooperation and trust. The interdependence of nations on our tiny planet requires a degree of forgiveness, an ability to transcend the horrors of the Holocaust.

But to forget and pretend the Holocaust did not occur would be as unforgiveable as to dwell on it forever, to the exclusion of all attempts at reconciliation. For from the ashes of such atrocities can sprout the seeds of a new world ethic, a repudiation of man's darkest hour.

Such was the spirit of the participants in the first U.N. General Assembly as they drafted the text of the Genocide Convention, declaring the murder and serious mental or physical harm of a racial, ethnic or religious group a crime punishable under international law. The treaty emerged as a direct result of the global comprehension of Germany's crimes. As such it represents the potential for men to learn and grow through horror and adversity.

It is with great shame that I must point out, as I have almost every day for the last 15 years, that the United States has yet to ratify the Genocide Convention. Forty years later, the two principals of the Holocaust are straining to bridge their differences. Yet America continues to ignore the potential of this treaty, drafted to unite the world community in opposition to the crimes of the Holocaust.

Like Helmut Kohl's trip to Israel, the Genocide Convention represents a bridge between nations, a vehicle through which the civilized world's aspirations for human rights can be expressed. I urge my colleagues to join in the spirit of reconciliation and to act now in giving our advice and consent to the Genocide Convention.

TOP PRIORITY IN STOPPING NUCLEAR WAR—STOP PROLIFERATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the most likely way for a nuclear war to erupt is through the spread of nuclear weapons to more and more countries. Over the past 38 years since this country used nuclear weapons to end World War II, only five or six other countries have developed a nuclear arsenal: Russia, the United Kingdom, France, China, India, and probably Israel. Five or six other countries including Argentina, Brazil, South Africa, and Pakistan are well on their way. They either have some nuclear arms capability now or they will soon. All have refused to sign the nuclear nonproliferation treaty. So all have in effect refused to permit inspection by an international agency to determine whether or not they are diverting nuclear materials and equipment to the production of nuclear arms. It is a very safe bet that they are doing exactly that. It is also a fact that this country or our allies are selling nuclear material or nuclear equipment or both to each of these countries. Think of what that means. Mr. President, this is absolutely outrageous. There is no excuse for it whatsoever. None. This policy of selling nuclear capability to other nations is the prime factor by far the biggest reason why nuclear war within the next generation is virtually certain. I say prime factor. I mean prime factor. You may ask—"But isn't the Soviet Union and a nuclear attack by the Soviet Union the principal threat to this country?" Absolutely not. We have a deterrent, so invulnerable in our nuclear powered and nuclear armed submarines and our nuclear armed bombers that a Soviet nuclear attack on this country would be an act of sure and certain suicide. We would certainly retaliate to such an attack with a devastating and total response that would utterly destroy the Soviet Union as an organized society. The Soviets know that. We know they have invaded Hungary and Afghanistan, that they have engaged in subversion of democratic free governments throughout the world. We know they have great military power and they would not hesitate to use that power against our country if they thought they could prevail. But we know they know they cannot prevail. We know they understand that such an attack would utterly destroy both countries. We know they are not insane. They want to live. So will they attack us with nuclear weapons? No. Certainly not in a planned, premeditated attack. With a launch on warning, hair trigger doctrine, and with enemy missiles only 5 or 6 minutes away, a mistake could occur at any time that could begin a nuclear war. But in all fairness the administration and the Defense Department have worked hard to reduce that risk. A nuclear war by mistake is far more likely than a planned attack by either side, but the odds are at least 10 to 1 against that kind of an accident.

Then can we relax? No way. The most likely beginning of a nuclear war—and here the odds are much more than even—will very likely come from the action of a country that will develop a nuclear war capability within the next few years. Some countries are working hard to develop that capability now and the research and testing of the superpowers will advance their schedule sharply. At this very moment our R&D specialists in the Pentagon are hard at work developing the very weapons that pose the greatest danger of starting nuclear war—not by a massive launch from a huge intercontinental ballistic missile, or from a huge bomber, but from the mouth of a 155 millimeter cannon. This would be a mini-nuclear device. It would revolutionize nuclear war strategy. It would make a nuclear war many times more likely. Why? Because it could come in so many new guises. Our military experts argue that they not only can produce the nuclear weapons that will fit a weapon as small as a 155 millimeter cannon. But it will also be much cheaper. And it will still pack a nuclear wallop. Perhaps each charge will not destroy an entire major city. But it will absolutely pulverize everything within a radius of a half a mile. And it will be so much cheaper: exactly what the doctor ordered for a Qadhafi or a Khomeni. The Iranian zealot dictator could totally decapitate the U.S. Government by exploding such a device a quarter mile from the Capitol when the President is giving his state of the Union speech to a joint session of the Congress in the presence of the Vice President, the entire Supreme Court, the full Cabinet, the House, the Senate, and the Diplomatic Corps. Terrorists could simply bring the bomb in a suitcase, plant it a quarter mile from the Capitol and detonnate it. This country with all its power would be left with no one to command it. And no idea against whom to retaliate. We are advancing this technology with our research and testing. And can anyone doubt that once we develop it, one way or another—with our weak kneed antiproliferation policies Libya and Iran will get it. And shortly thereafter terrorists will be all set to go. That is one likely scenario. There are others. For instance, Libya, or Iraq could nuke Israel. India could launch a nuclear attack on Pakistan or vice versa. Argentina would defend itself with a new nuclear capability against Brazil or Chile or even the United Kingdom. And once it starts how do you stop? Would this country move in to end it? Would we use our vast nuclear arsenal to threaten the aggressor? If the aggressor called our bluff, would we nuke them? Would Russia sit quietly on the sideline? Would anyone use its awesome nuclear power?

I challenge anyone who does not believe that the spread of nuclear weapons will lead to nuclear war to squarely face the fact that at this very moment wars are going on in many parts of the world, and that in most of the numerous conflicts the only reason nuclear weapons are not used is because they are not available. What happens when they are?

THE 70TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, recently, one of this country's most respected international relief organizations celebrated its 70th anniversary. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee is the overseas arm of the American Jewish community. Since its inception, the JDC has provided critically needed assistance to Jews and Jewish communities around the globe. Founded in 1914, the JDC began its operations by assisting Jews in Eastern Europe and Palestine during World War I. Since that time, the JDC has continued to be at the forefront of Jewish refugee relief efforts, assisting over the years millions of Jews in more than 70 countries.

The American Joint Distribution Committee has operated wherever and whenever the need has existed for its services. Following World War II, the JDC provided basic relief to displaced and impoverished European Jews, playing a major role in their rehabilitation, and aiding great numbers to emigrate to Israel. Today, in Eastern Europe the JDC helps many elderly Jews live out their lives in dignity by providing much needed medical services, food, clothing, and cash grants. In Israel, the JDC contributes to over 100 Israeli programs aiding the elderly, the mentally and physically handicapped, and the chronically ill. JDC funds also help support a nationwide network of community centers. At this time, the JDC is active in some 30 countries.

I warmly congratulate the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee on this landmark anniversary. The JDC has truly been a safekeeper of world Jewry, a force for humanity and caring.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a more detailed account of the 70th anniversary of the JDC, written by the distinguished veteran journalist, Boris Smolar, and published in the Jewish Community Bulletin of Los Angeles, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MATTERS OF CONCERN—"JOINT" MARKS 70TH YEAR OF JEWISH RESCUE

(By Boris Smolar)

The two-day annual meeting of the American Joint Distribution Committee in New York recently, marked the 70th year of the organization's existence. Formed in 1914, at the outbreak of World War I, the JDC's earliest relief activities were targeted to the kibbutzim and yeshivot in Palestine, which was then still a part of Turkey. The money was raised from Jewish communities of East and Central Europe.

When Turkey entered the war on the side of Germany, all aid to Palestine was brought to a halt. Knowledge of the "terrible situation" then faced by Palestine's Jews came to American Jewry through Henry Morgenthau, Sr., the American Ambassador to Turkey, and led to the formation of a committee which formed the nucleus of what was to become the JDC.

It was the first time in the history of American Jews that all Jewish groups merged into one body, instead of, as previously, operating in fragmented groups—German, Sephardi, East European; Orthodox, Reform, Conservative; wealthy, middle-class, working-class organizations which each went its own way.

Although the JDC has until now spent about $1.5 billion in rescue, relief and rehabilitation of millions of Jews around the globe, conducts operations in about 30 countries and spends about $48 million annually (with $10 million spent in Israel), the story of its seven decades of service to millions of impoverished and imperiled Jews is not fully known to most American Jews born after World War II, who never witnessed the colossal relief and rehabilitation activities conducted by the Joint between World Wars I and II.

Many have a vague knowledge of the tremendous aid programs carried out by a unit of about 30 American experts in Jewish social work whom the JDC sent to Poland immediately after World War I ended. The unit found the great majority of the more than three million Jews literally starving. It opened soup kitchens for adults and milk stations for children. It provided the impoverished Jewish population with food and clothing on a grand scale.

It set up hospitals, clinics, dispensaries, sanatoria and a school to train Jewish nurses. It established institutions to take care of thousands of Jewish children who became war orphans or were separated from their parents during the war years. It helped Jewish schools on all levels. It assisted thousands of Jews to emigrate to the United States which had no immigration quotas at that time.

A most important achievement by the JDC in the early years of its relief work in Poland was the reconstruction of post-war Jewish economic life there by establishing more than 1,000 credit cooperative and loan ventures which granted low-interest loans to artisans and shopkeepers, enabling them to remain in business in the face of boycotts and harassments conducted by anti-Semitic Polish political parties after Poland won its independence. Poland was part of czarist Russia for generations until the end of World War I.

The JDC also played an important role in helping Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany before the Holocaust years as well as those in Nazi-occupied Poland and in other Nazi-held lands. The JDC helped Jews liberated from Nazi camps reach Palestine in great numbers as "illegal immigrants" when the country was under British administration and mercilessly refused to admit Jewish remnants of the Holocaust held in camps for displaced persons in liberated Germany and cared for by the American military authorities and JDC.

Few American Jews know of the magnificent homes the JDC established and maintained in Israel for sick and elderly survivors of the Nazi regime immediately after the proclamation of Israel as a Jewish state. They don't know of the role the JDC played in rebuilding the Jewish communities in Europe which the Nazis destroyed during the occupation years.

A review of the educational and health and welfare activities of the JDC in Israel and guidelines for the next five years in the field of health, education and social welfare were submitted to the annual meeting by Ralph Goldman, executive vice-president. Priorities for the immediate future were given in these guidelines to two areas—aid for the aged and child and youth health

The most important parts of the JDC annual meeting were, as always, reports on the relief activities of the organization in various countries during the current year and consideration of proposed programs for the next year. Of special interest were the reports on the aid the JDC provides for Jews in countries of Eastern Europe—Rumania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Yugoslavia—where the organization is permitted to operate through the Jewish communities there.

As a result of negotiations by the JDC, the Egyptian government agreed recently to permit JDC relief for Jews there.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY NEARS

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, 66 years ago this month, the independence of the Republic of Lithuania was proclaimed. In less than 3 weeks from today, on February 21, I will lead the Senate's annual commemoration of Lithuanian Independence Day, and I invite my colleagues to join in making their own statements at that time.

As I have done each year for more than a decade, I will welcome my friends from the Lithuanian community to join this commemoration by coming to Washington to observe the commemoration on the floor of the Senate. Americans of Lithuanian descent have been instrumental in keeping the plight of their friends and relatives in the homeland very much in our national awareness. And despite the restrictions placed on their freedom by the Soviet regime, Lithuanians in the homeland continue to affirm their national identity and their pride in their traditions.

I will have more to say during the morning hour on February 21.

TRIBUTE TO JIM RANGE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this week marks an important turning point in the life and career of Jim Range, counsel to the majority leader. Effective this Friday, Jim will complete his service with the Senate, and take up his new responsibility as director of the Washington office for Waste Management, Inc.

For the last several years, in his capacity as counsel to the majority leader, Jim Range has helped to guide the Senate schedule, advised the majority on issues of both substance and schedule, and provided the majority leader with thoughtful and balanced counsel.

I know the majority leader will miss Jim Range's helpful advice and counsel. Those of us who have had the pleasure of working with Jim Range wish him well in his new pursuits.

Mr. President, I have nothing else. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS AND RECESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the time for the transaction of routine morning business has expired. I understand the minority leader has claimed his time under the standing order as previously reserved. We will recess at 12 o'clock under the order previously entered, which leaves less than 10 minutes. I think it would not be appropriate then to try to get back to the legislative business in the short time remaining. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent the Senate now stand in recess until the hour of 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. Morning business is closed.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 11:50 a.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. LUGAR).

EXCLUSIONARY RULE LIMITATION ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1764) to amend title XVIII to limit the application of the exclusionary rule.

The Senate proceeded to further consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is my hope the managers will be here shortly and that we can finish this bill in a fairly prompt order this afternoon.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the distinguished and able Senator from Maryland wishes to speak now at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, as the Senate takes up Senate bill 1764, I believe that it would be useful to focus our attention first not on the language of S. 1764 itself but on some even more fundamental language. That is the language of the Bill of Rights, the language of that amendment to the Constitution which guarantees the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures.

What does that language says? The fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States reads as follows—and I shall be didactic enough to read it verbatim because it is so important. The fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States says:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

How do you enforce such a sweeping guarantee? How can citizens be assured that the promise made in the fourth amendment will be kept?

For the past 70 years the Federal courts have used one primary method of enforcing this right. The courts have forbidden the Government to use evidence obtained in violation of this right in order to convict a defendant of a crime against the United States.

The bill before us, Senate bill 1764, would reverse the consistent policy of more than two-thirds of a century.

Like most principles of constitutional law, this policy, which has become known in common parlance as the exclusionary rule, is not spelled out in the words of the Constitution. It is not embodied in any statute. It is not enunciated in any act of Congress. It results from judicial interpretation of the fourth amendment and from the responsibility of the courts to give force and life to the standards that it contains.

Since 1961, a period of more than two decades, the exclusionary rule has applied not only in the Federal courts but in every court in the land in which defendants stand accused of crime.

During all of those years Congress has never spoken on the wisdom or the lack of wisdom of the exclusionary rule. We have never said this is bad policy; we have never criticized the rule; and the courts have continued to observe it.

The bill before us would break that historic silence. It would put the Senate on record in opposition to the exclusionary rule.

It would in certain circumstances prohibit the Federal courts from excluding evidence obtained in violation of the fourth amendment.

In those circumstances it would authorize the conviction and the punishment of defendants in Federal court even if there is not sufficient legally obtained evidence to prove their guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. That would be a remarkable change in the administration of justice in this country.

The fourth amendment is a bulwark of the Bill of Rights. The fourth amendment has a very proud history, arising directly out of the events which gave birth to the Nation. But as important as it is, we should remember that it is not self-enforcing. In numerous cases the Supreme Court has held that the exclusionary rule is needed to give life to the fourth amendment and to enforce its protections.

That is why I would call the attention of Senators to the fourth amendment itself and that is why I believe that the central question before us is this: How can the right guaranteed by the fourth amendment be enforced? How can it best be enforced? How can it be made to protect all American citizens?

Now, the questions that are presented by this bill are very complex, very sensitive, and very difficult.

Only once in the whole long history of the exclusionary rule has the Senate ever undertaken a thorough examination of the rule and given careful consideration to the arguments for and against legislative modification. That examination took place in the Subcommittee on Criminal Law during the 97th Congress. At that time it was my lot to be the chairman of the subcommittee. We held a series of hearings, four in all, on the exclusionary rule, and we took the testimony of 12 panels of witnesses, a round dozen of panels, and compiled a hearing record of more than 800 pages. In my view, these hearings are sufficiently comprehensive to form the basis for responsible action on Senate bill 1764.

It is on the basis of this record, not my unsubstantiated views, not my inchoate thoughts on the subject, but on the basis of the hearing record of a dozen panels and of many witnesses—that I have concluded that this bill ought not to be enacted into law. I urge Senators to vote against it.

Now, my opposition to the bill is based on two reasons: First, I am not persuaded that the Congress has the authority under the Constitution to diminish the scope of the exclusionary rule. Second, even if it is admitted for the sake of the argument that the Congress has the constitutional authority, I do not think it would be wise, as a matter of policy, to enact a so-called good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule.

Now, for those who shrink from the sound of the human voice, I would say that I set forth my views rather fully in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on Senate bill 1764, so at this point I will merely summarize those views.

Before we can even consider the policy question of whether we ought to modify the exclusionary rule, I think we have to confront the constitutional question of whether the legislative branch has the power to do so. In this regard, there is general agreement that the Congress, acting as the National Legislature, lacks the power to change the clear command of the fourth amendment, or to change the strictures against unreasonable searches and seizures. By placing the guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure in the Bill of Rights, our predecessors in the First Congress of the United States made certain that future Congresses could not undo what they had done.

Now I for one have no wish to undo what the authors of the Bill of Rights have done. I for one have no desire to amend the fourth amendment. I have no interest in weakening the protections for privacy and for personal security and for individual autonomy that the fourth amendment provides. I have confidence that the vast majority of Senators would feel the same way. But, in all candor, I wonder if the proponents of this bill are among that majority.

During the hearings in the 97th Congress and in the time that has elapsed since then, I have given very careful consideration to the argument against the exclusionary rule. I cannot avoid the conclusion that some of the rule's opponents are unhappy, not, Mr. President, with the rule, not with the courts' application of the rule, not with the effect of the rule, but with the fourth amendment itself. That is what their objection really is; it is with the fourth amendment.

I wonder if these proponents of Senate bill 1764 have lost sight of a basic fact. Very few of the costs to society that are ascribed to the exclusionary rule actually derive from the rule itself. If the exclusionary rule is the mechanism whereby the courts are deprived of relevant probative evidence of crime, then the real reason for the deprivation is not the rule. The real reason is the fourth amendment. Evidence excluded because it has been obtained in violation of the fourth amendment is generally evidence that the police would not have obtained had they obeyed the fourth amendment.

So what we see here is a very close relationship between the fourth amendment and the exclusionary rule that enforces it. That relationship suggests that we have to consider carefully what message we will send if we enact a law weakening the exclusionary rule. I think it is inescapable that the message will be that we wish to weaken the protection of the fourth amendment. I believe we have to think long and hard before we send that kind of message to the American people.

Of course, the question of sending messages is a secondary question. We have within recent days just been through the exercise of sending a message about our concern about the crime problem. But today we ought to talk about substance and not about shadow.

The most substantial issue that we have to address today is the constitutional status of the exclusionary rule. And that is not an easy question. In fact, the constitutional question is a difficult one.

The Supreme Court, in a whole line of cases culminating in Mapp against Ohio in 1961, settled on the exclusionary rule as the most effective available means for enforcing the fourth amendment guarantees. Reams of paper and rivers of ink have been devoted to the question of whether the exclusionary rule is a constitutional requirement. The question is whether it is part and parcel of the fourth amendment or whether it is something else.

Now, without directly addressing that question, the very extensive record developed in the hearings to which I have referred has convinced me that the Constitution requires at least some effective means of enforcement of the fourth amendment. The exclusionary rule, with all of the flaws that are credited to it, is one such means of enforcement. I believe that it cannot be eliminated—even with respect to unconstitutional searches conducted in "good faith"—without providing for another comparably effective remedy, an alternative. And to eliminate or weaken the exclusionary rule without providing an alternative would, in my view, be unconstitutional. Until I am persuaded that a comparably effective method exists to enforce the fourth amendment, I cannot support legislation to weaken the exclusionary rule.

So I lay that as a challenge before the proponents of Senate bill 1764. If they want to weaken or abolish the exclusionary rule, what alternative method of enforcement do they propose?

When we entered the Senate, every Senator took an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. That obligation requires us to make an independent judgment of the constitutionality of this bill. I do not see how any Senator could support Senate bill 1764 unless he is satisfied that this bill would in no way detract from the protections accorded to all Americans by the fourth amendment of the Constitution.

Now on this question, the constitutional question, I think we have to exercise our own best judgment. Simply counting heads or tallying up the endorsements from experts of one kind or another, largely self-proclaimed, will not settle the question.

Nevertheless, I take some comfort in the fact that opponents of the bill have in their corner a distinguished authority on the law of search and seizure. I refer to the former Justice of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Potter Stewart. Justice Stewart retired in 1981 after more than 22 years of distinguished service as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. His tenure on the Court encompassed years of revolutionary change in the jurisprudence of the fourth amendment to the Constitution.

In 1961, which was 2 years after Justice Stewart joined the Court, the case of Mapp against Ohio was decided. The Mapp decision extended to the courts of the States the principle which had been applied in Federal courts for almost half a century: The exclusionary rule.

After Mapp, no court in the land was permitted to consider, in a criminal case, evidence which had been obtained in violation of the fourth amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures.

In April 1983, Justice Stewart, who participated in so many of the seminal cases of fourth amendment law, delivered the Harlan Fiske Stone lectures at Columbia Law School in New York. His topic was "The Road to Mapp v. Ohio and Beyond: The Origins, Development, and Future of the Exclusionary Rule in Search and Seizure Cases."

For every Senator who wants to consider seriously the issue that is now before the Senate, I would commend the conclusive, dispassionate analysis that Justice Stewart made in those lectures.

For easy reference, I would point out that the lectures have been printed in the Columbia Law Review, volume 83, beginning at page 1365. I hope every Senator will quickly repair to the library to seek out those lectures.

One of Justice Stewart's lectures addressed the precise question which is before us today as we consider this bill. The title of the lecture delivered on April 27, 1983, poses the question, "Does the Constitution Require the Exclusion of Illegally Obtained Evidence?" Justice Stewart's observations are perceptive, wise and pertinent, and I think it would be useful to share some of them with my colleagues.

Justice Stewart begins, as I did, with the words of the amendment itself, and of the Bill of Rights as a whole:

> Standing alone, the Bill of Rights simply lists certain rights guaranteed to the people, as well as selected activities the federal government may not regulate, and others in which the federal government may not engage. It offers little guidance as to how these rights should be preserved or how violations should be remedied. Because the Fourth Amendment provides that the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures "shall not be violated," a person who learned that he was about to be the victim of such a search could refer directly to the words of the Fourth Amendment in seeking to have the violation enjoined. But that is the only instance in which the text of the Fourth Amendment suggests a remedy. Obviously, advance notice of an unconstitutional search or seizure is not often given. Thus, except in the rarest of circumstances, the Constitution does not explicitly prescribe one of the most important features of the right to be secure in one's person, house, papers, and effects: the sanction for violations of that right. But in my opinion, the Framers did not intend the Bill of Rights to be no more than unenforceable guiding principles—no more than a code of ethics under an honor system. The proscriptions and guarantees in the Amendments were intended to create legal rights and duties.

Those are the words of Justice Stewart the Senate should ponder as it considers this bill. He continues:

> The Bill of Rights is but one component of our legal system—the one that limits the government's reach. The primary responsibility for enforcing the Constitution's limits on government has, at least since the time of Marbury v. Madison, been vested in the judicial branch. In general, when law enforcement officials violate a person's Fourth Amendment rigths, their principal purpose is to obtain evidence for use in criminal proceedings. To give effect to the Constitution's prohibition against illegal searches and seizures, it may be necessary for the judiciary to remove the incentive for violating it. Thus, it may be argued quite forcefully that although the Constitution does not explicitly provide for exclusion, the need to enforce the Constitution's limits on government—to preserve the rule of law—requires an exclusionary rule. Viewed in this light, the exclusion of unconstitutionally obtained evidence is not a constitutional right. Rather, it is a right only in the sense that every remedy vests a right in those who may claim it.

In the Weeks case, Justice Day recognized that, without an exclusionary rule, the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against illegal searches and seizures may be rendered ineffective. (quote) "If letters and private documents can . . . be seized and held and used in evidence against a person accused of an offense, the protection of the Fourth Amendment . . . is of no value, and . . . might as well be stricken from the Constitution." (unquote). Similarly, that concern prompted Justice Holmes to state in the Silverthorne case that, without an exclusionary rule, the Fourth Amendment would be reduced to (quote) "a form of words." (unquote)

The opinions in the Weeks and Silverthorne cases were surely correct in saying that the Constitution and the rule of law require that the Fourth Amendment not be reduced to a mere form of words, virtually stricken from the Constitution. In my view, however, that fact does not necessarily require that one particular remedy—exclusion—be adopted. Instead, the Constitution requires only that there be some effective remedy to ensure that agents of the government obey the Fourth Amendment. Thus exclusion is constitutionally required only if, without it, there would be no adequate means to ensure that the government obeys the Fourth Amendment.

Now, Mr. President, that is the challenge that Potter Stewart issues to the Senate today. He says, "You do not have to have the exclusionary rule, but if you do not have it, you have to have something else."

My argument is that Senate bill 1764 does not provide anything else. It creates a vacuum. It creates a hole. In that last passage that I quoted from Justice Stewart, I think he put his finger on the question before us: If we weaken the exclusionary rule, what remedy do we provide in its place?

A very cursory perusal of Senate bill 1764 discloses the answer. It provides nothing. It provides no alternative remedy. It has no new answers.

We remit victims of fourth amendment violations to the remedies which exist apart from the exclusionary rule: in other words, the status quo, except for the remedy which the Supreme Court has found to be most effective to deter and punish violations of the fourth amendment.

The victims may ask, if we are to be relegated to the status quo, what does the status quo provide? Well, Justice Stewart discussed that at some length at Columbia University. I think his thoughts on that subject are well expressed and well worth reading, and I commend them to the Senators. I will not take the time at this moment to read them at length, but I will try to summarize his conclusions. He said:

In sum, the most "powerful" remedies, criminal prosecutions for willful violation of the Fourth Amendment and actions for injunctions against large-scale violations, are rarely brought and rarely succeed. Damage actions for Fourth Amendment violations serve the salutary objective of compensating all victims of Fourth Amendment violations in a manner and to a degree reasonably related to the harm resulting from the infringement. But damage actions are also expensive, time-consuming, not readily available, and infrequently successful. As a result, the deterrent effect of these actions can hardly be said to be great, since the prospect of a judgment for money damages is extremely remote.

Justice Stewart concludes:

Taken together, the currently available alternatives to the exclusionary rule satisfactorily achieve some but not all of the necessary functions of a remedial measure. They deter the grossest of violations, as well as Government policies that legitimate these violations. They compensate some of the victims of the most egregious violations, but they do little if anything to reduce the likelihood of the vast majority of fourth amendment violations.

Let me repeat Justice Stewart's words, "but they do little if anything to reduce the likelihood of the vast majority of fourth amendment violations"—

The frequent infringements animated by commendable zeal, not condemnable malice. For those violations, a remedy is required that causes the police officer to channel his enthusiasm to apprehend a criminal toward the need to comply with the dictates of the fourth amendment. There is only one such remedy.

Mr. President, these are not my words. These are the words of Potter Stewart.

There is only one such remedy, the exclusion of illegally obtained evidence. It was with that in mind that I wrote in the Court's opinion in the Elkins case that "the rule compels respect for the constitutional guarantee in the only effectively available way by removing the incentive to disregard it." I believed then and I believe now that the exclusionary rule is constitutionally required, not as a right explicitly incorporated in the fourth amendment's prohibitions, but as a remedy necessary to ensure that those prohibitions are observed in fact. Thus, although I did not join in the Court's opinion in the Mapp case, I agree with its conclusion that the exclusionary rule is necessary to keep the right to privacy secured by the fourth amendment from remaining an empty promise.

So spoke Potter Stewart, one of the greatest justices who in the history of this Republic has sat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. He is a wise man, an experienced man, a thoughtful man, a learned judge. I ask the Senate today if it wishes to fly in the face of such an opinion.

(Mr. COCHRAN assumed the Chair.)

Mr. MATHIAS. I have already noted, Mr. President, that the constitutional issue before us is one as to which each Senator has an obligation, under the oath taken when we stood before the Chair and became Members of the Senate, to exercise judgment. I would suggest that our judgment will be supported and assisted by careful consideration of the arguments advanced by Justice Potter Stewart.

Before the Senate leaves the constitutional question at least for the moment, there are two points that I think deserve attention. The first concerns the fact that the exclusionary rule is what is often called judge-made law. It is not the product of a statute; it is not the organic law produced by a constitutional convention; it does not even appear in so many words in the text of the fourth amendment itself. It has simply been implied from the words of the amendment by the courts as a method of enforcing the Constitution, it has been implied from the requirements of the fourth amendment. The argument of the proponents of the Senate bill 1764 seems to be that the Congress can constitutionally modify or even abolish—if you can do one, you can do the other—the exclusionary rule because it is not explicitly set forth in the Constitution.

Now, I observed that the argument deserves attention. I am not suggesting that it deserves very much attention, but it deserves some attention because it betrays a misunderstanding of the process of constitutional adjudication. No one claims that the exclusionary rule appears within the four corners of the Constitution in explicit terms. But there are many bedrock principles of American jurisprudence, fundamental principles of American society, fundamental and basic principles of our constitutional system, that are implied and not explicit. And that does not mean that we are free to modify them or to abolish them in some whim at some changing point of history.

Take, for example, the principle that no criminal punishment may be imposed without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Now, read, if you will, the Constitution from beginning to end, from the first word to the last word, and find for me, if you can, the words "proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." Of course, as the distinguished Presiding Officer well knows, since he is a scholar, you will search in vain, because those words do not appear in the Constitution. But does that mean Congress has the authority to pass a statute, to enact a law, which says that henceforth guilt need only be proved by a preponderance of the evidence?

Just introduce such a bill and see what response you get.

Or, Mr. President, what about the principle that counsel must be provided for indigent defendants if a prosecution may result in conviction and a sentence to imprisonment? Is there any Senator who can point to that principle set forth in specific words in the Constitution? Look as you will, you will look in vain. But does that mean that this Congress has authority to enact a law that directs the courts not to bother about appointing counsel for indigents in criminal cases? Is there any Senator under that delusion? Of course, Mr. President, as you well know, we cannot. Under the Constitution we have no authority to do either one of these things. We cannot abrogate these guarantees, which are I think accurately described as constitutional guarantees, even though they do not appear is so many words within the four corners of that great document we call the Constitution.

Now, the proponents of Senate bill 1764 argue that those examples refer to what they call substantive guarantees. We are talking here about remedies. Senate bill 1764 would not change the substantive content of the fourth amendment. It simply addresses the means by which it is enforced, the way in which violations are remedied. That is the way their argument goes.

Well and good. Well and good. Leave to one side the question of whether the distinction is really as clear cut as that. A good argument could be made that the elimination of the exclusionary remedy will in practice shrink the area of substantive protection under the fourth amendment. But let us assume with the sponsors of the bill that only remedy is involved here. Does that mean that the Congress then is free to modify or eliminate other remedies that the courts have implied for the enforcement of constitutional rights? Look again at the question of appointing counsel for indigent defendants. The courts have implied a remedy for violations of the sixth amendment in that area: Convictions obtained in violation of the right-to-counsel guarantee must be reversed. Prior convictions which were obtained without appointing counsel cannot be used to increase punishment in a later case.

Now, suppose the Congress is unhappy with this remedy. Could we pass a statute that provides that henceforth no defendant who has been convicted without the benefit of counsel in violation of the sixth amendment would have his conviction reversed? Could we pass a statute that would send an uncounseled defendant to prison or to the electric chair or to the gas chamber because we disagree with the remedy that has been crafted by the courts?

I do not believe a single Senator today would make that contention.

Now, would it make any difference if we went beyond what Senate bill 1764 proposes and we provided some alternative remedy? What if we were to say that uncounseled defendants could not have convictions reversed, but would have a civil cause of action for damages flowing from the violation of sixth amendment rights? If we adopt Justice Stewart's reasoning, perhaps that approach would be constitutional, if the civil action was comparably as effective as the threat of reversal in enforcing sixth amendment rights. This example may help to put the issue before us in some perspective. I think we have to look long and hard at any proposal to improve on the remedies for constitutional violations which the courts have already crafted. And with respect to a bill such as Senate bill 1764, which would in certain cases eliminate the only remedy which the courts have ever deemed to be effective, we have to conclude that this bill is unconstitutional. And that conclusion is not affected in the least by the fact that the exclusionary rule is not written into the Constitution.

Enactment of this bill would set a dangerous precedent. The remedies implied for violation of any constitutional right—and, indeed, much of the content of the right itself—would be in peril. Would the enactment of a good-faith exception to the policy which remedies violations of the fourth amendment pave the way for good faith exceptions in other areas? Will we next leave without a remedy the victims of good faith violations of the first amendment?

"I just, in good faith, closed down your newspaper." Or, "I just, in good faith, made a mistake and closed down your church." Or, "I, in good faith, told you that you could hold a political rally. I did it all in good faith. I really felt there was something wrong." Or, "The fact that your paper was not published is just too bad. I did it in good faith, so don't worry about it." Or, "I violated the fifth amendment or the sixth amendment, but I did it in good faith, so don't worry about it."

I think if we slip down that slope, there is no telling where we will end. What would then be left of the constitutional guarantees, once we move off in that direction?

Finally, we need to remember the crucial role of the Supreme Court. The Court has its admirers and its critics. But, under our system of constitutional law, the Court is the ultimate arbiter of rights and remedies. Without question, the Court has the power to modify the exclusionary rule in the manner desired by the proponents of S. 1764.

In the 1961 case of Mapp v. Ohio (367 U.S. at 650), and in both earlier and later cases, the Supreme Court has spoken most emphatically, holding that the remedy of evidentiary exclusion is an "essential ingredient" of the right guaranteed by the fourth amendment. See also Wolf v. Colorado (338 U.S. 25, 27-29 (1949)). The Court has had countless opportunities in the 23 years since Mapp was decided to overrule or modify that decision, to change its interpretation of the fourth amendment. It has never chosen to do so.

But the Court may change its collective mind. That, in fact, is precisely what the Justice Department is asking the Court to do in this very term. The constitutional controversy in which we are now embroiled may be settled by the Court within the next few weeks or months. Under these circumstances, I ask the authors of this bill, Is it not pointless for us to grope about in the dark on these questions, when illumination may be close at hand?

The Supreme Court has agreed to review three cases that present questions that bear directly on the constitutional basis for S. 1764. One of these cases has been mooted by the death of the defendant. But the Court recently heard oral argument in the other two cases.

In the case of Massachusetts v. Sheppard (No. 82-693), the Court is being asked to decide "whether the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts erred in refusing to recognize a good faith exception to the exclusionary rule."

More significantly, the Court granted the petition of the Solicitor General of the United States in the case of United States v. Leon (No. 82-1771), raising the following issue:

> Whether the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule should be modified so as not to bar the admission of evidence seized in reasonable, good-faith reliance upon a search warrant that is subsequently held to be defective.

The question is precisely the one which must be answered before we can act responsibly on legislative proposals to change the exclusionary rule. Although the Justice Department is certainly entitled to proceed simultaneously in both the legislative and judicial arenas in its quest for a change in the exclusionary rule, commonsense dictates that we wait for the Court's decision on the essential constitutional question before we act.

However, let us put aside these constitutional questions for a moment and focus on the words of the bill before us. Also, let us assume—which I find very difficult, but let us do it for the moment—that the position taken by the proponents of the bill is, in fact, the correct one. Let us assume that we have the power under the Constitution to enact a good faith exception to the exclusionary rule.

Then we are forced to turn to another set of questions: Is the good faith exception good policy? Assuming that we have the power to enact this bill, should we, as a matter of wisdom and judgment, enact it?

This question was among those posed by the Subcommittee on Criminal Law of the Committee on the Judiciary to the numerous experts who testified on the exclusionary rule during the 97th Congress. Most of those witnesses, even those who sharply criticized the exclusionary rule as it now exists, answered that the good faith exception proposed by this bill was a bad idea. They said that the good faith exception was a bad idea.

Few critics of the exclusionary rule have presented a more detailed and knowledgeable analysis of the perceived shortcomings than Prof. Steven R. Schlesinger, who is presently the Director of the Bureau of Justice Statistics. Professor Schlesinger told the subcommittee that the enactment of a good faith exception "would build an unsatisfactory halfway house between the retention and abolition of the rule."

Judge Malcolm Wilkey, who eloquently presented the case against the exclusionary rule in the subcommittee, also spoke of the good faith exception. He characterized it as a compromise between the status quo and abolition of the rule. He observed:

> Unlike many compromises, this is the kind of compromise which may be as disastrous as trying to make the Grand Canyon in two jumps.

That is a rather vivid metaphor.

The full committee has disregarded this candid advice from those who share the majority's distaste for the exclusionary rule as currently applied. Instead, the committee has reported to the Senate a bill that would leave us, if we want to extend the metaphor suggested by Judge Wilkey, with both feet firmly planted in midair and looking down about 5,000 feet to where we are about to drop.

There are several reasons to believe that the good faith exception approach to exclusionary rule reform is unsound on policy grounds. One of these objections stands out in the testimony of the witnesses before the subcommittee. A good faith exception will do nothing to clarify the confusion and uncertainty that, the proponents tell us, now plagues the law of search and seizure. On the contrary, as Professor Schlesinger has pointed out, recognition of the exception "virtually guarantees years of trial and appellate litigation focusing on what constitutes good and bad faith violations."

The bright line tests that have proven so elusive to the courts would recede even farther into the distance.

Judge Wilkey has testified that the routine filing of suppression motions by defendants in criminal cases "is the heart of the burden [imposed] on the judicial system" by the exclusionary rule. In his view, this is true even though the vast majority of such motions are denied, and very little evidence actually is suppressed. Adoption of the good-faith exception would have some effect on the already lopsided win-loss record of the Government on these motions, but it would not relieve the courts of their burdens in the slightest degree.

In fact, there is good reason to believe that S. 1764, far from clarifying fourth amendment law, will actually worsen the confusion.

I have explained at length, in my minority views to the committee report, why I fear this consequence, and I will not repeat that argument here. Instead, I would like to turn to the specific provision of S. 1764 which concerns searches conducted pursuant to a warrant.

In Senate bill 1764, we find not only the creation of a good faith exception in the field of search and seizure generally, but also a definition of one circumstance in which the court must apply the exception.

When a search is conducted pursuant to a warrant, which was not obtained through intentional and material misrepresentation, S. 1764 would forbid suppression of the evidence obtained by the search unless, as the report puts it, the defendant can "affirmatively demonstrat[e] bad faith," not the absence of good faith, but bad faith.

The proponents of the bill clearly intend to deprive the court of the power to exclude such evidence even if the warrant was improperly issued because the facts underlying it did not amount to probable cause.

It is hard to imagine a provisions that conflicts more directly with the language of the fourth amendment, which declares that:

> No Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place top be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The force of this crucial part of the amendment would be considerably diminished were Congress to bar any effective review of the magistrat's decision to issue a warrant. Enactment of S. 1764 would bestow upon the magistrate's ruling just such a mantle of unreviewability.

The effect of the adoption of this blanket good faith exception for warrant cases would be to confer on the decision of a magistrate a sort of finality that is nearly unprecedented in our legal system. The magistrate's decision could be reviewed on appeal only where the defendant or the victim of the search could claim bad faith or misrepresentation.

We all know that this standard will reduce appellate review to a bare minimum. We know this, without being told. We know it as a matter of experience.

The Senate, for example, does not traffic in bad faith or in misrepresentation, but we all know that the Senate as a body, and I should add individual Senators as well, sometimes make decisions that are just plain wrong, that are mistaken. In this respect I do not think that magistrates are any different from the Senate. They may sometimes, without being guilty of bad faith and misrepresentation, be mistaken. They may be in error.

There will probably be few cases in which these officers misapply the strictures of the fourth amendment, but I am confident that there will be almost none in which errors arise from bad faith or misrepresentation. The protections which S. 1764 leaves in place to enforce the warrant clause are a very thin reed to lean on.

This provision of S. 1764 may not make a great deal of practical difference. The standard of review of magistrate's decisions on warrant applications is already quite deferential—and properly so. But, once again, this bill sets a precedent that could be perilous. If the decisions of State and local magistrates, many of whom are laymen without expert legal training, cannot be reviewed on the merits, then the command of the fourth amendment that "no warrant shall issue" would have a very hollow ring.

Justice Robert Jackson has observed, with regard to the Supreme Court, that "we are not final because we are infallible, but we are infallible only because we are final."

Our legal system is uncomfortable with the idea that the decision of one court should be unreviewable by any power in the universe. Because the buck has to stop somewhere, we have a Supreme Court which does have the last word, which is "infallible because it is final."

The blanket warrant exception of S. 1764 would confer the same status on hundreds of U.S. magistrates, and, if the States pick up the cue, which they certainly are likely to do, on thousands of local magistrates in every corner of the land. These magistrates, however dedicated, however honest, however acting in good faith, are simply not infallible, and their decisions should not, Mr. President, be final. There is simply no justification for any change in the current practices with respect to judicial review of decisions upon application for search warrants.

With respect to the good faith exception, one final point must be mentioned. The institution of such an exception is, in my view, certain to retard the development of the law of search and seizure. Under S. 1764, once the good faith of the police officer has been determined, the legality of his conduct under the fourth amendment is irrelevant to the prosecution before the court. It is fanciful to believe that our already overburdened Federal judges will take these opportunities to reach beyond their constitutional jurisdiction and render advisory opinions on whether or not the police conduct also violates the fourth amendment. Accordingly, the increased specificity which results when the fourth amendment's precepts are applied to particular facts will be lost.

This stunting of fourth amendment jurisprudence is particularly worrisome because the challenges to the fourth amendment have never been greater. In the year 1984, it should not be necessary to speak to this issue, certainly not at any great length. The rights embodied in the fourth amendment are being sorely tested by the rapid development of computer and communications technology. New questions about the legitimate limits of privacy claims are abounding. The duty to enforce the law and the right to be let alone are clashing on new and strange battlefields of whose contours I must say I think we are only dimly aware.

No better expression of this challenge can be found than the words of Justice Louis Brandeis, dissenting in the seminal case of Olmstead against United States, in 1927. Quoting a phrase from an earlier decision, Justice Brandeis wrote:

> But "time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes." Subtler and more far-reaching means of invading privacy have become available to the Government. Discovery and invention have made it possible for the Government, by means far more effective than stretching upon the rack, to obtain disclosure in court of what is whispered in the closet.
> Moreover, "in the application of a constitution, our contemplation cannot be only of what has been but of what may be." The progress of science in furnishing the Government with means of espionage is not likely to stop with wire-tapping.

These were prescient words, Mr. President:

> Ways may some day be developed by which the Government, without removing papers from secret drawers, can reproduce them in court, and by which it will be enabled to expose to a jury the most intimate occurrences of the home. Advances in the psychic and related sciences may bring means of exploring unexpressed beliefs, thoughts and emotions. "That places the liberty of every man in the hands of every petty officer" was said by James Otis of much lesser intrusions then these. To Lord Camden, a far slighter intrusion seemed "subversive of all the comforts of society." Can it be that the Constitution affords no protection against such invasions of individual security?

Of course, Justice Brandeis' predictions have come to pass. The electrical impulses in computer memory, in high-speed data links, include, among other things, expressions of our thoughts and emotions, and all the other information which the fourth amendment seeks to protect. The means of disclosing these in court are at hand. The new technology presents new ways of committing crime, and new ways of detecting crime; but it also presents new frontiers for the right of privacy which is so central to our democratic society.

How do we answer Brandeis' question? Can it be that the Constitution affords no protection against such invasions of individual security? Surely it can be just that. It can be that the fourth amendment will not protect our privacy in the new information age, if we undermine the remedy—the only effective remedy—which the courts have ever found to enforce that provision of the Bill of Rights. It can be that the fourth amendment will fail to meet the new challenges presented, if we retard the development of search and seizure law by removing the opportunity for further judicial interpretation.

No thoughtful person can be entirely satisfied with the status quo in the law of search and seizure. The fourth amendment is clear and concise, but its application by the courts has sometimes been confusing. Courts sometimes appear to exclude evidence for reasons that may exalt form over substance. And surely there are some cases in which the central cost of the exclusionary rule—the suppression of probative evidence of crime—exacts a high price from society. Undeniably some defendant who have committed serious crimes are freed because, in Cardozo's famous phrase, "the constable has blundered."

But the proponents of change in the exclusionary rule have painted a far gloomier picture of the current situation than the facts warrant. Accordingly, it may be useful to consider what will or will not happen if we leave the rule alone.

First, to dispose of the claims of some of the more intemperate partisans of this legislation, the crime rate will not increase as a result of inaction in this area. There is simply no evidence of a connection between crime rates and the application of the exclusionary rule.

Second, while some defendants will be acquitted because there is not sufficient legally obtained evidence to prove their guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, their numbers will be very small, and, in the case of violent crimes against the person, minuscule.

Third, the exclusionary rule is unlikely to be applied with indiscriminate liberality—at least not while the current Supreme Court sits. As the majority points out, the Court over the past decade has refused to expand the scope of the exclusionary rule, has cut back on its application in some areas, and may, in the current term, recognize some sort of good faith exception. Furthermore, this Court has been far more zealous than its predecessors in its willingness to review and reverse more expansive State court applications of the exclusionary rule.

Fourth, the law enforcement officers of the Federal Government will not be hampered in their ability to detect and solve crimes against the United States. To the extent that their ability to search persons and places and to seize property will be restrained, the restraint will derive, not from the exclusionary rule, but from the fourth amendment to the Constitution, a provision which is beyond the power of the Congress to amend or repeal.

Finally, if we decline to weaken the exclusionary rule, we will reaffirm our commitment to the right of our people to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, and to the fundamental charter from which that right derives.

Some of the witnesses before the Subcommittee on Criminal Law pointed out that no other country systematically denies the Government the power to fine or imprison citizens on the basis of evidence resulting from illegal Government intrusion on the citizen's privacy. This does not impress me as an argument against the exclusionary rule. It strikes me more as a testament to our Nation's commitment to restraining the power of Government, even though that restraint has a cost. Perhaps no other nation so deprives the Government of the benefit of illegally obtained evidence because no other nation is so dedicated to the privacy, autonomy, and liberty of the individual.

Justice Robert H. Jackson was one of the most distinguished prosecutors ever to serve on the Supreme Court. Mr. Justice Jackson, writing in 1947, observed that the fourth amendment—> like each of our constitutional guaranties, often may afford a shelter for criminals. But the forefathers thought this was not too great a price to pay for that decent privacy of home, papers and effects which is indispensable to individual dignity and self-respect. Harris v. United States, 331 U.S. 145, 198 (dissenting opinion).

Former Justice Potter Stewart takes a similar view:

> The inevitable result of the Constitution's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures and its requirement that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause is that police officers who obey its strictures will catch fewer criminals. That is not a political outcome impressed upon an unwilling citizenry by unbeknighted judges. It is the price the Framers anticipated and were willing to pay to ensure the sanctity of the person, the home, and property against unrestrained governmental power.

If we are no longer willing to pay this price to protect our individual liberties, then we should amend our Constitution. But if we remain dedicated to the principles of that charter, then we should reject the legislation before us.

Mr. President, I have to conclude that on grounds of both constitutional law and on grounds of policy, we must defeat this bill and I ask Senators to vote against it.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, at the outset, I compliment my distinguished colleague from Maryland for a very erudite presentation.

Just as the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) has congratulated Mr. Justice Stewart, so too it would be appropriate to invoke those accolades on the outstanding presentation just made by Senator MATHIAS.

I had occasion, as a member of the Criminal Law Subcommittee, to sit with Senator MATHIAS on some of those hearings to which he referred and to observe his chairing those hearings. I think that the presentation he has just made is in the finest tradition of this body.

Mr. President, in rising to speak today on S. 1764, I would also like to compliment other of my colleagues, the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) who has done such an outstanding job in the crime package; the distinguished Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT) and the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), who have worked on the Committee on the Judiciary in bringing forth this bill.

I must disagree with their conclusions in sponsoring S. 1764, however, and I intend to vote against the bill for reasons that I am about to outline.

In so doing, I consider my concern for law enforcement in this Nation second to none, based on the experience that I have had in some 14 years in law enforcement, including two terms as District Attorney in Philadelphia, the work that I have done on the President's Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals, and for the past 3 years on the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. President, just as there must be a concern for law enforcement, so too there must be a concern for upholding the Constitution and the constitutional right to freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures and the other mandates of the fourth amendment.

The logical starting point from analysis of S. 7164, I would submit, is the fourth amendment itself which provides that:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Too often I believe we fail to refer to the amendment itself and the document itself in question. It is my opinion and my judgment that the amendment speaks of prohibition against warrants without probable cause, not of the good faith of a police officer in stating probable cause, but rather in absolute terms that there must be probable cause before a warrant shall issue. And that means a statement of fact which establishes probable cause, not what a police officer may believe in good faith to be a statement of fact which would establish probable cause.

Similarly, in the clause on unreasonable searches and seizures, a reasonable search and seizure depends upon the establishment of probable cause, not what someone may think, good faith or not, as to what constitutes probable cause.

It is my view, Mr. President, that law enforcement has accommodated the exclusionary rule. Were this debate to have been held in 1961, immediately after the decision in Mapp against Ohio, or perhaps in 1914, after the decision in United States against Weeks, it would have been a timely debate and a timely addressing of this issue.

I was not on the scene after the Weeks decision, so I cannot speak directly to the situation at that time. But I was an assistant district attorney in 1961 and I remember well the day that Mapp against Ohio came down. It caused widespread consternation in the criminal courts on a daily basis. The initial reaction in Pennsylvania was one of dismay.

If I may, Mr. President, I would like to cite very briefly from an article which I published in the University of Pennsylvania Law Review, volume 111, No. 1, of November 1962.

I ask unanimous consent at this time to include very limited portions of the article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, realizing the cost involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mapp v. Ohio: PANDORA'S PROBLEMS FOR THE PROSECUTOR

(By Arlen Specter)*

Police practices and prosecution procedures were revolutionized in many states by the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in Mapp v. Ohio that evidence obtained from an illegal search and seizure cannot be used in a state criminal proceeding.[1] The experiences of law enforcement officials in Philadelphia and recent decisions of many state appellate courts indicate that the imposition of the exclusionary rule upon the states is the most significant event in criminal law since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. In the past quarter century state criminal procedures have frequently been affected by the expanding interpretation of the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment; but Mapp has rewritten the criminal trial treatise for states which had admitted evidence regardless of how it was obtained.

Extreme consequences have been experienced in former nonexclusionary jurisdictions. The Annual Report of the New York City Magistrates' Courts disclosed that gambling cases dropped thirty-five percent in the year following the ruling in Mapp, a statistical change which is attributed to that decision.[2] A similar result has occurred in Philadelphia, although specific figures are not available. According to the New York report, the larger number of warrants necessitated by the new ruling has so substantially increased the work of the magistrates' courts that a separate division will probably be required.[3] In Philadelphia the trial courts, as well as the magistrates' courts, have been inundated by the flood of problems on warrants and motions to suppress resulting from Mapp.

The initial reaction in the Pennsylvania courts was one of dismay. The Superior Court characterized. Mapp v. Ohio as a "hurricane" which "swept over our fair land last June." One Philadelphia trial court judge was so surprised by the Mapp holding that he said it applied only to Ohio as far as he was concerned until the Pennsylvania appellate courts told him otherwise. Another Philadelphia County judge, when first confronted with Mapp, refused to follow it, reasoning that the new interpretation came from a divided court, and he agreed with the dissenters. A distinguished Pennsylvania jurist and author on criminal procedure questioned "the logic of or the justification for Mapp."

In the first days after Mapp, law enforcement officials in Philadelphia were uncertain as to what course to take. Policemen, who for years had presented their evidence in court without any regard to how it had been obtained, could not understand the subtleties of what constituted a legal search and seizure. When some Philadelphia trial judges applied principles from liberal federal decisions on search and seizure, the vice-squad detective and the policeman on the beat could understand neither the logic of what had been decided nor the formula for how to act in the future in order to obtain admissible evidence. One enforcement officer of the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board turned a phrase on a century old case and called the new national exclusionary rule the "dread Mapp decision."

The defense bar shared in the confusion, but not in the gloom. Cases which appeared hopeless in May of 1961 were won in July, when key evidence was excluded because "the constable had blundered." Within three months after Mapp was decided, the Philidelphia District Attorney's Office circulated a twenty five page memorandum on the law of search and seizure. While the analysis of cases in the federal courts and the exclusionary states was of some assistance, the memorandum was too long and complicated for the police to digest and too short and shallow to provide answers for the vast majority of problems faced by the Philadelphia trial courts in their efforts to reconcile Mapp with the administration of justice in a metropolis faced with major problems of law enforcement.

The avalanche of search and seizure cases since Mapp has produced procedures and principles of law to guide those states which once admitted unconstitutionally seized evidence. Many state appellate courts sought to interpret the effect of the new federal rule on their state practices. The crucial impact of Mapp, however, has doubtless been felt in the trial courts and at preliminary hearings in magistrates' courts. Only a small percentage of trial court decisions are reported and, except for scattered observations on magistrates' actions in preliminary hearings, the experience at that level is virtually totally lost.

It is unfortunate that the search and seizure case law at preliminary hearings and in the trial courts cannot be comprehensively catalogued in order to provide precedents for future decisions, and even more importantly, to serve as a basis for evaluating the policy and social justifications for a far reaching decision like Mapp v. Ohio. That decision might be reconsidered if sufficient recorded experience were available to illuminate the practical day-by-day consequences of the exclusionary principle.

To shed some light on Mapp's impact on law enforcement in a major city and state which had formerly admitted evidence regardless of the method of seizure, this Article will concentrate on the grass-roots experience in Philadelphia and the reaction, in oral argument as well as written decision, of the Pennsylvania appellate courts. Such an analysis is possible because the Appeals Division of the Philadelphia District Attorney's Office has handled the search and seizure problems as they arose on pretrial motions as well as in appellate arguments. The composite picture shows an evolving state common law on such issues as: what constitutes a reasonable search; the effect of consent on eliminating the need for probable cause; the required contents of a search warrant; and the procedure for raising objections based on Mapp.

Mr. SPECTER. But as I noted at that time, the initial reaction in the Pennsylvania courts was one of dismay. The superior court characterized Mapp against Ohio as a hurricane which swept over our fair land last June. One Philadelphia trial court judge was so surprised by the Mapp holding that he said it applied only to Ohio as far as he was concerned until the Pennsylvania appellate courts told him otherwise. Another Philadelphia county judge when first confronted with Mapp refused to follow it, reasoning that the new interpretation came from a divided Court and he agreed with the dissenters. One law-enforcement officer of the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board turned a century-old phrase and called the new national exclusionary rule the "Dred Mapp decision."

There was great dismay in Pennsylvania and I think across the Nation at that time. Had the Congress sought to cure or alter the situation then, I would suggest that it might have been very timely indeed.

It is my judgment that law enforcement has now accommodated itself to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the decisions of Mapp against Ohio and Weeks against United States.

I would refer to the famous quotation from Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes when he wrote in "The Common Law" back in 1881 that, "The life of a law has not been logic: it has been experience." That is as true today as it was 103 year ago when Justice Holmes first wrote it. Our experience has been that law enforcement has indeed become accommodated to the exclusionary rule.

I would point, Mr. President, to the 1979 General Accounting Office study of some 2,804 cases in 36 U.S. attorneys' offices around the country, which found that the exclusionary rule had a low impact on prosecutors. In only four-tenths of 1 percent of the cases did the U.S. attorney decline to prosecute a case primarily because of search and seizure problems. Overall, the evidence was excluded in court on fourth amendment grounds in only 1.3 percent of the cases. Fourth amendment motions were filed in 10 percent of the cases; where filed, 80 percent of those cases were granted an evidentiary hearing on the motions; and the motions were denied in 85 percent of the cases.

Similarly in 1982, the National Institute of Justice made a study of felonies in the California State courts from 1976 through 1979 and found only a slightly greater impact from the exclusionary rule. Overall, 4.8 percent of all cases declined for prosecution were declined because of search and seizure problems; 3.7 percent of all court dismissals of felonies were for search and seizure reasons, and a breakdown showed a large number involved drug charges, 71.5 percent, robbery only 2.1 percent, rape only 3 percent, and murder just 1 percent.

From my one experience in law enforcement, including the job of district attorney in Philadelphia, I know that after we distributed an extensive memorandum on the subject, reviewed with police officers, held lecture sessions after evidence was presented, and screened cases, we were able to comply with the requirements of the Mapp decision.

As I noted again in the law review article in 1962:

[T]he police have been seriously handicapped by the exclusionary rule in the first year after Mapp. The right to privacy has not been significantly promoted during that time since the police have not fully understood and hence not fully complied with the Mapp rule. Initially, the only beneficiary has been the acquitted criminal. But in the future it is probable that altered police practices will enhance the right of privacy and the police should learn to function reasonably well within the confines of the exclusionary rule.

It is my judgment now, Mr. President, some 22 years later, that the police have learned to function within the confines of the exclusionary rule.

It is also my view that were S. 1764 to be passed, there would be a significant loss of privacy; that the benefits which have been gained would be significantly lost; the Congress of the United States would be attempting to alter the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; that police would inevitably conclude that they could cut back on the care that they exercise to enter homes, to enter automobiles, to enter buildings of all sorts, and on procedures and practices used to stop people on personal searches and seizures. That would be unwise and an unwarranted retrogression of the law of privacy.

I would submit further, Mr. President, that is is wise in our society to leave this issue within the purview of the Supreme Court of the United States, as Congress has chosen to do for the past 23 years since the Mapp decision. As noted by Senator MATHIAS, and I shall not repeat much of what he said, there are cases now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, argued less than a month ago on January 17, 1984, which pose this issue of the good-faith exception. It is a matter of considerable controversy and subject to extensive debate whether the Court or the Congress is better equipped at this stage to make the essential judgments as to whether the good-faith exclusion ought to be made.

My own judgment is that the Congress, as the legislative body, does have the paramount determination on public policy questions, but that in a case like this one, where the Congress has deferred to the Court for so long, and the Court has engaged in such extensive discussions and analyses on the exclusionary rule, it is better practice at this time to leave this issue to the Court.

Congress might take congressional notice, so to speak, of the current conservative nature of the Supreme Court of the United States. If it is wise to alter the exclusionary rule with the good faith exception, can expect the more conservative Court to enter that sort of a judgment. This is not the same Court which decided Mapp in 1961 followed by Escobedo, followed by Miranda, followed by Gault, in a range of decisions by the Court which expanded rights at that time, but rather this is a Court with a very strong bent for a conservative approach. Their analysis has been very extensive indeed.

In closing, Mr. President, I think it useful that the brief comments of Mr. Justice Stewart directed to the good faith exception as part of this Harlan Fiske Stone lectures, reprinted in a few pages in the Columbia Law Review, be printed in the RECORD at this point. I ask unanimous consent that these few pages, less than 5 pages, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GOOD FAITH EXCEPTION

The most hotly debated means by which the exclusionary rule could be modified would be "not to require the exclusion of evidence obtained in the reasonable belief that the search and seizure at issue was consistent with the Fourth Amendment." That is the issue on which the Supreme Court last Term invited and heard reargument in the case of Illinois v. Gates. A version of this so-called "good faith exception" was adopted by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Williams, and by Justice White, concurring in the judgment in Gates. The Attorney General's Task Force on Violent Crime has endorsed such an exception. During the last session of Congress, the Subcommittee on Criminal Law of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary held hearings on legislation that would create such an exception, and similar bills have been introduced in the 98th Congress.

The argument in favor of the good faith exception rests on three premises. First, under Calandra and its progeny, exclusion is required only where its deterrent effects outweigh its costs. Second, when a police officer acts with reasonable, but mistaken, belief that his conduct is consistent with the requirements of the fourth amendment, the rule's deterrent purpose would not be served by exclusion, because, by hypothesis, the police officer acts in a manner that should not be discouraged. Third, exclusion frequently results in the freeing of the guilty—by general agreement a terrible social cost—and therefore exclusion should not be required where the police officer reasonably believed his actions were constitutional.

Opponents of the good faith exception have taken issue with all three of these premises. On the first point, they argue that—contrary to the language in the Calandra opinion calling for a careful weighing of costs and benefits—the use of illegally obtained evidence at trial is itself a violation of the fourth amendment. In addition they seek to revive the now dormant "imperative of judicial integrity" as an independent basis for exclusion.

Most of the opponents' arguments, however, are directed at the second premise—that the rule's deterrent purpose would not be served by excluding evidence seized by a police officer acting with the reasonable, but mistaken, belief that his conduct was consistent with the fourth amendment. Critics of the proposed point out—correctly, in my view—that the exclusionary rule is not designed to serve a "specific deterrence" function; that is, it is not designed to punish the particular police officer for violating a person's fourth amendment rights. Instead, the rule is designed to produce a "systematic deterrence"; the exclusionary rule is intended to create an incentive for law enforcement officials to establish procedures by which police officers are trained to comply with the fourth amendment because the purpose of the criminal justice system—bringing criminals to justice—can be achieved only when evidence of guilt may be used against defendants. Adopting a good faith exception, opponents argue, would put a premium on ignorance and would reduce the incentive for police departments to train their officers to comply with the fourth amendment.

With respect to the third premise, that the benefits of the good faith exception outweigh its costs, opponents of the proposal argue—again, correctly in my view—that adopting it would have a profound symbolic effect on the public's, and more importantly the police's, perception of the Court's commitment to enforce strictly the requirements of the fourth amendment. They also argue that the adoption of the good faith exception would prevent the courts from resolving recurring questions about the proper interpretation of the fourth amendment, since there would be no need to address the question of whether an officer's actions were constitutional so long as they were "reasonable."

In my view there are a number of additional problems with the proposals for a good faith exception now under discussion. First, in many instances, reasonable mistakes by law enforcement officials are already tolerated by the fourth amendment. In recent years the Supreme Court has held that allegations of negligent falsehood or innocent mistake of fact are insufficient to set aside a search warrant and that reliance on a substantive criminal statute later held unconstitutional does not dissipate a finding of probable cause. Thus, if the officer's reasonable belief in the constitutionality of his actions is mistaken only because it is based on an erroneous view of the facts or of the criminal statutes to be enforced, and not on an erroneous view of what the fourth amendment requires, I am not sure that his conduct can be said to violate the fourth amendment at all. However, if the proposal is to tolerate searches and seizures where, despite the deference given to the magistrate's determination, a reviewing court cannot conclude that the police officer had probable cause—even while giving the officer the benefit of the doubt where he reasonably relied on a mistaken view of the law or the facts—it approaches the "subjective" good faith approach condemned by the Supreme Court nearly twenty years ago in Beck v. Ohio.

"We may assume that the officers acted in good faith in arresting the petitioner. But 'good faith on the part of the arresting officers is not enough.' . . . If subjective good faith alone were the test, the protections of the Fourth Amendment would evaporate, and the people would be 'secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects,' only in the discretion of the police."

Supporters of the proposal respond that subjective good faith is not sufficient to satisfy the test—the officer's belief that the fourth amendment tolerates the conduct at issue must be a reasonable one. However, this response fails to justify the proposed good faith exception. Consider how this approach would work in real cases. There are four kinds of situations in which a police officer could have a reasonable, but mistaken, belief that the fourth amendment permits a particular search or seizure. The first is where the officer acts in conformity with the fourth amendment's requirements as they stood at the time of the search, and those requirements changed dramatically because of a judicial decision rendered after the search. The Court has ruled, however, that fourth amendment decisions announcing a "clear break" with past precedent are not to be applied retroactively to exclude evidence seized in compliance with then-existing standards. Thus, in this sort of case the proposed exception is unnecessary. The second situation occurs when a police officer's conduct falls into what may be described as an "unsettled area" of fourth amendment law that is settled by the courts after the conduct but before the trial at issue. During the 1981 Term, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that the new precedent should not be applied retroactively in those situations, ruling that resolving all unsettled fourth amendment questions nonretroactively would give law enforcement officials "little incentive to err on the side of constitutional behavior."

These same concerns govern the third kind of situation in which the good faith exception might be invoked, where the search at issue presents the occasion for the trial court to settle a previously unsettled question of fourth amendment jurisprudence. If the courts admit illegally obtained evidence in such situations, there would be little reason for police officers to err on the side of caution where constitutional principles are unsettled. Furthermore, the determination of whether or not to require exclusion in this situation is similar to a determination whether or not to apply a new constitutional principle in the case which announces it. If a party who brings such unsettled questions before the courts is to be deprived of the benefit of a ruling in his favor, there may be a rather strong incentive not to be such a party.

In the fourth situation a police officer has a "reasonable" but mistaken view of what settled fourth amendment principles require in a praticular context. I doubt that an exception for this type of conduct is either wise or constitutional. Consider this hypothetical: a police officer, reasonably well trained, one may assume, undertakes a search believing that he is acting within the bounds of the Constitution. Under well-settled precedent, however, his conduct violates the fourth amendment. Assuming that, in fact, the courts have explicated the requirements of the fourth amendment in less than perfectly comprehensible rules, one may grant that there can be such a reasonable mistake as to what the Constitution requires. However, one may argue with some force that rejection of an exception for this sort of "good faith" conduct is required by the Court's decision in United States v. Johnson. There the Court rejected the government's argument that retroactive application of a decision resolving an unsettled question of fourth amendment law "would not serve the policies underlying the exclusionary rule." If, as the Court held, those policies are served by requiring exclusion when police officers make a mistake while acting in a constitutional "gray area," it is clear that the same policies are served when officers act unconstitutionally by engaging in conduct that is prohibited under settled fourth amendment precedent. Furthermore, if this exception were adopted, police officers might shift the focus of their inquiry from "what does the fourth amendment require?" to "what will the courts allow me to get away with?" It seems inevitable in these circumstances that adoption of the proposed exception would result in more fourth amendment violations.

There is a last troubling aspect of the good faith exception. One version of the proposal would accept an officer's reliance on a search warrant obtained without intentional misrepresentation as conclusive proof of his good faith regardless of whether the warrant was based on probable cause. Currently a magistrate's determination that probable cause exists must be accorded considerable deference. This is as it should be because that deference gives rise to a proper allocation of responsibilities between magistrates and reviewing courts. But, if the fourth amendment's probable cause requirement is to be enforced, reviewing courts must have the authority on occasion to inform magistrates in a meaningful way that warrants based on something less than probable cause are not to be tolerated. Now as I said, supporters of the rule argue that reviewing courts could determine whether a search warrant was supposed by probable cause even if a good faith exception were adopted. There are constitutional questions about this approach, but let us assume that courts may admit evidence obtained in reasonable good faith while declaring that the warrant pursuant to which it was obtained was not supported by probable cause. Where this is done, the magistrate may recieve an opinion, perhaps years after signing the warrant, informing him that a mistake was made. But there is no incentive—apart from a professional desire to comply with the fourth amendment—for that magistrate to refrain from repeating the same mistake in the future or from granting any colorable request for a search warrant.

CONCLUSION

One of the great benefits of being a retired, rather than an active, Supreme Court Justice is that I may take the liberty of posing difficult questions without incurring the obligation to decide the cases in which they arise. My retirement has also enabled me to take the opportunity to share my personal thoughts about the exclusionary rule with you. I have suggested that the exclusionary rule is a constitutionally mandated remedy, necessary to enforce the fourth and fourteenth amendments, and that proposals to modify the rule must preserve an effective remedy. I believe, however, that the proposed good faith modifications fail to meet this constitutionally mandated standard.

Mr. SPECTER. In sum, therefore, Mr. President, I submit that the language of the Constitution precludes the good faith amendment, that the demonstrated accommodation by State law enforcement shows there is no need, and that whatever change is necessary should be left in the hands of the Supreme Court of the United states, which has this matter under active consideration at the present time.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I want to commend Senator THURMOND, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and the other nine members of that committee that voted to report S. 1764, a bill we need enacted into law. I urge my colleagues to look beyond all the technical aspects of this court-made rule to the everyday applications of the exclusionary rule and ask, "Has justice been served?" I want us to consider what the American public thinks on this issue.

The abuse of the exclusionary rule has caused a disdain and disrespect toward our judicial system. When straight-forward evidence is excluded from a trial or a clear and convincing conviction is overturned, both due to a technicality, is justice really being served? Are we affording equal rights under the law or are we not really going beyond reason in our protection of the accused?

My attention became more focused on the need for reform of the exclusionary rule in November of last year. At that time Judge Ralph Thompson, who is a Federal judge sitting on the U.S. District Court bench in Oklahoma City, handed down a remarkable, and I believe landmark, decision in United States of America against Owens. Judge Thompson carved out a "good faith" exception to the exclusionary rule.

I recommend to my colleagues that they read this decision, which vividly points out the need for this legislation. For that reason I ask unanimous consent Mr. President for inclusion in the record of copy of the United States of America against Owens decision and of a front page article of November 29, 1983, entitled "'Bad' Search Criminal Evidence is Admitted," from an Oklahoma City newspaper, the Journal Record, and an editorial on Judge Thompson's ruling which appeared in the November 30, 1983, Oklahoma City Times.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF OKLAHOMA

United States of America, Plaintiff, vs. Merle Ellis Owens, Defendant: No. CR-83-240-T.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

The defendant is charged by a two count indictment, Count I charging him with conspiracy to possess cocaine with intent to distribute in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 846 and Count II charging him with possession with intent to distribute in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1).

Before the Court for consideration is (1) defendant's Motion to Suppress Evidence, (2) his Motion for Judgment of Acquittal as to Count I of the Indictment, and (3) the case on its merits.

On November 14, 1983, the Court heard testimony and arguments addressed to the defendant's Motion to Suppress Evidence, which was taken under advisement. Thereafter the defendant waived his right to a jury trial and the case was presented to the Court sitting without a jury. At the close of the government's case the defendant moved for judgment of acquittal on Count I of the indictment on the grounds that the government had failed to present any evidence in support of it.

This Memorandum Opinion and Order contains rulings both on the defendant's motions as well as the Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law from the trial.

THE CONSPIRACY COUNT

As to Count I of the indictment, the government failed to present any evidence of an agreement between the defendant and another concerning possession of the cocaine with an intent to distribute it. In the absence of evidence concerning such an agreement, a finding that the defendant conspired with others cannot be made. United States v. Vergard, 687 F. 2d 57 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Houde, 596 F. 2d 696 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 965 (1979). Accordingly, the defendant's motion for judgment of acquittal as to Count I of the indictment is sustained. Rule 29, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

THE POSSESSION COUNT

As to Count II, the evidence presented at trial established that approximately 2.3 ounces of cocaine that was 88 to 89 percent pure, a triple beam scale for measuring precise quantities in small amounts, a quantity of a diluting agent, Mannitol, a quantity of marijuana, various drug paraphernalia and a loaded gun were recovered by the police in the defendant's motel room under circumstances more specifically described hereafter. The cocaine had a "street value" of about $60,000. The defendant was the sole registered guest and occupied his motel room with a female companion for an extended period of time prior to and at the time of, his arrest. During his occupancy the defendant had received an extraordinary number of incoming telephone calls and visits of short duration by unidentified persons all of which aroused the suspicion of the motel management and prompted surveillance of the room.

These circumstances are sufficient to establish the defendant was in constructive possession of the cocaine. "Constructive possession" of a controlled substance occurs when a person does not have physical possession but does have the intent and capability of maintaining dominion and control of the substance or the ability to reduce it to actual possession. United States v. Martinez, 588 F.2d 495 (5th Cir. 1979).

In view of the quantity of cocaine seized in the presence of a diluting agent, the sensitive measuring device, and the circumstances and activities described, the reasonable inference to be drawn is that the defendant intended to distribute a portion of his supply to others. United States v. Ramirez-Rodriques, 552 F.2d 883 (9th Cir. 1977). 21 U.S.C. § 802(11) defines "distribute" to mean "to deliver" 21 U.S.C. § 802(8) defines "deliver" to mean "the actual, constructive, or attempted transfer of a controlled substance. The government is not required to establish the existence or anticipation of a sale. United States v. Workopich, 479 F.2d 1142 (5th Cir. 1973). Moreover, the mere passing of narcotics between two individuals for their own personal use constitutes a distribution. United States v. Branch, 483 F.2d 955 (9th Cir. 1973). The defendant was the sole registered occupant of the motel room in which the cocaine was discovered. There is no evidence to indicate that the cocaine was jointly acquired by the defendant and his companion, see, United States v. Swiderski, 548 F.2d 445 (2nd Cir. 1977). Even if the defendant did not intend to sell the cocaine to others, he at least possessed it with the intention of sharing it with another.

Accordingly, the evidence is sufficient to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant constructively possessed the cocaine with the intent to distribute it in violation of 21 U.S.C. § 841(a)(1), provided, the cocaine in his possession is legally admissible in his trial. Thus, the admissibility of the cocaine, as the product of a warrantless search, as challenged by the defendant's Motion to Suppress Evidence, is the determinative issue of the case.

THE MOTION TO SUPPRESS EVIDENCE

After keeping the defendant's room under surveillance thoughout the preceding night, on the morning of September 12, 1983, Officer Epperly, accompanied by Officer Matthews, both of the Oklahoma City Police Department, returned to the motel where they requested a public records check on the license tag of the defendant's car. They were advised that the license tag had been reported stolen. The officers kept the defendant's room under further surveillance. Between 7:30 and 12:00 noon they observed a female looking out of the room from time to time. Additionally, it is noted that the motel manager may have requested the officers to enter the room and remove the occupants and their possessions on the basis that the defendant had registered as, and been charged for, a single occupancy whereas two persons occupied the room, and further that the defendant was unpaid beyond check-out time without permission. About noon, Officers Epperly and Matthews, together with another officer, Digby, devised a plan to entice the defendant out of his room, pursuant to which Digby, who was not in uniform, knocked on the door of the room and, posing as a motel employee, asked the defendant to move his car so that maintenance could be performed on the parking lot. When the defendant departed his room and got into his car, he was arrested on the felony charge of receiving stolen property. After securing the defendant, Epperly and other officers proceeded to enter the defendant's room where they discovered the defendant's companion asleep on a bed. Also located about the room were the marijuana cigarettes, the various items of drug-related paraphernalia, the triple beam scale, various chemicals, glassware and the loaded gun. They opened a dresser drawer and in it found two closed bags containing the cocaine. The search and seizure were conducted without their first having obtained a search warrant.

The question here is whether the extent of the search conducted in the defendant's room can be justified as an exception to the requirement for a search warrant under the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.[1] A search conducted without a warrant is valid only to the extent that it complies with the particular requirements of the justifying exception unless information validly discovered during the search justifies a further search pursuant to one of the exceptions. Here the defendant was validly arrested while occupying a motor vehicle with a stolen license tag. Inasmuch as the police officers believed, not unreasonably, that the defendant had a companion in his motel room who posed a risk to their personal safety, the officers were justified under the exigent circumstances to enter the defendant's room in order to neutralize the possibility of harm. Inasmuch as the officers were validly present in the room, they could seize any contraband or evidence of criminal activity which was in their plain view. Coolidge v. New Hampshire, supra.

However, none of the generally recognized exceptions would have permitted the officers to extend their warrantless search into the contents of a closed container in a closed dresser drawer under these circumstances.

Therefore the cocaine offered as evidence against the defendant was seized by the police as the result of an unauthorized search. If the "exclusionary rule" is applied absolutely, such evidence of defendant's guilt must be excluded and the defendant acquitted. If the rule is not applied, or if a "good faith exception" to the rule is applied, the evidence is admissible and the defendant is found guilty.

THE EXCLUSIONARY RULE

The exclusionary rule is not a part of the Fourth Amendment itself. It had its birth in 1914 when the United States Supreme Court decided Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914). There it was held that the use at trial of illegally seized evidence constituted prejudicial error. The holding was justified on the grounds that the remedy it had fashioned was necessary to protect the individual's privacy as secured by the Fourth Amendment. More recently, the remedy fashioned in Weeks has been justified on the grounds that its "prime purpose is to deter future unlawful police conduct". United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 at 347 (1974). However, decisions of the Court increasingly question the efficacy of the rule for this purpose, express concern for the high price society is paying for the doubtful beneficial effects it is providing and continue to make significant departures from its application in certain circumstances.

In his dissenting opinion in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971) at 416, Chief Justice Burger stated "there is no empirical evidence to support the claim that the rule actually deters illegal conduct of law enforcement officials." In Calandra, supra, the Court held that the rule "has never been interpreted to proscribe the use of illegally seized evidence in all proceedings or against all persons."[2]

In Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976), the Court denied application of the rule in federal habeas corpus review of state convictions under certain conditions, while otherwise reaffirming its adherence to the rule. However, the Court also indicated that it should not be applied through a blind adherence to judicial policy:

"The disparity in particular cases between the error committed by the police officer and the windfall afforded a guilty defendant by application of the rule is contrary to the idea of proportionality that is essential to the concept of justice. Thus, although the rule is thought to deter unlawful police activity in part through the nurturing of respect for Fourth Amendment values, if applied indiscriminately it may well have the opposite effect of generating disrespect for the law and administration of justice." 428 U.S. at 490-1 (footnote omitted).

Protecting citizens from unlawful police conduct and all other violations of constitutional rights is profoundly laudable and necessary. However an analysis of the controlling authorities permits the conclusion that the rule need not be applied as a matter of judicial rote and that it is not the only remedy that can be applied for a Fourth Amendment violation. It is acknowledged that, as yet, no Supreme Court decisions have expressly so held.[3]

However, while arising out of different factual circumstances, other courts have concluded that the present state of the controlling decisions does not require an absolute application of the rule and permits, at least, a good faith exception to it. See United States v. Williams, 622 F.2d 830 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1127, which held that where law enforcement officials have acted without authority or mistakenly, yet in the reasonable good faith belief that such action was proper, the exclusionary rule shall not apply. I conclude that while the exclusionary rule remains as one of the remedies to protect against unlawful policy activity, a good faith exception may apply in a proper case and, moreover, the rule is but one of several remedies that can be applied for such violations.[4] It is neither the only remedy or deterrent nor the one required to be imposed absolutely when such a violation has occurred.

Among the other existing remedies presently available for such violations are civil suits for money damages against the erring officers, state and federal, and their employing agencies. 42 U.S.C. § 1983; Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, supra. The availability of these remedies provide both redress for the individual and deterrents from further unlawful police conduct.[5]

Given the availability of other protections in the form of remedies and deterrents, the old concept that "the criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered" is nei-

[1] There are generally nine recognized exceptions to the Fourth Amendment requirement that police officers must obtain judicial approval to conduct a search. These exceptions are as follows: (1) search conducted incident to a valid arrest, Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969); (2) a stop and frisk, Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968); (3) a search conducted under exigent circumstances that compel the search to occur, Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978); (4) a search of a motor vehicle in certain circumstances, Michigan v. Long, — U.S. — (1983), 51 U.S.L.W. 5231; (5) evidence in plain view, Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971); (6) airport searches to prevent air piracy; (7) border and customs searches, United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606 (1977); (8) Searches conducted in a security institution such as a prison, Lanza v. New York, 370 U.S. 139 (1962); and (9) a search conducted pursuant to a valid consent, Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973).

[2] In Calandra, the Supreme Court refused to extend the application of the rule to grand jury proceedings. In reaching this conclusion, the Court balanced "the potential injury to the historic role and functions of the grand jury against the potential benefits of the rule." In United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727 (1980), the Supreme Court refused to apply the rule at trial to evidence unlawfully seized from a third party not before the court by weighing the benefits of the rule to the detriment caused by its imposition. In reaching its conclusion, the Court cited Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206 (1960), for the proposition that: "[A]ny apparent limitation upon the process of discovering truth in a federal trial ought to be imposed only upon the basis of considerations which outweigh the general need for untrammeled disclosure of competent and relevant evidence in a court of justice." 447 U.S. at 735.

[3] Abolition or modification of the exclusionary rule could be accomplished legislatively. However, to date, no such action has been taken by the Congress.

[4] An excellent discussion of the social costs involved in the application of the exclusionary rule, and an analysis of the benefits that could be obtained through other remedies may be found in "Enforcing the Fourth Amendment by Alternatives to the Exclusionary Rule," by Judge Malcolm Richard Wilkey, 95 F.R.D. 211.

[5] Such civil remedies are, after all, the remedies available to innocent victims of unlawful police conduct against whom no criminal charges are lodged. In the absence of a demonstrated need to apply the exclusionary rule for an egregious violation of the Fourth Amendment by police officers, a guilty defendant should have no greater rights, benefits or remedies than innocent victims. When the exclusionary rule in criminal cases is automatically applied, the remedies available to a guilty defendant are unjustifiably disproportionate to the remedies available to an innocent victim.

ther necessary constitutionally nor affordable socially.

In this case, the police found themselves legitimately in a room virtually overflowing with evidence of criminal activity. Their error was that they proceeded to search the contents of a closed drawer in the room without first obtaining judicial approval. Had the police officers sought such approval, it is a virtual certainty that it would have been granted. Had they first obtained a warrant it would have delayed, but not prevented, the police discovery of the evidence sought to be suppressed. While the defendant complains that his Fourth Amendment rights were violated, the remedy he seeks, i.e., the exclusion from trial of evidence clearly establishing his guilt, is not only disproportionate to the injury he has suffered, but is vastly disproportionate to society's interest in seeing the guilty convicted without artificial obstructions.

In all of the foregoing circumstances, I find that the officers acted in the reasonable good faith that their act was proper, that the good faith exception applies and the evidence shall not be excluded by application of the rule.

Moreover, even without the application of the good faith exception, under the foregoing circumstances I find that no application of the rule is justified.

By applying the exclusionary rule only the undeniably guilty defendant will benefit by the exclusion of valid evidence establishing his guilt. As a practical consequence, as in other such cases, society will be harmed by being denied the protection it is due from the criminal justice system. The fundamental purpose of a trial, being a search for the truth, will be obstructed. It will free the guilty, produce a result that appears fictitious and absurd and foster disrespect for the law.

It is further acknowledged that no reported cases have construed the decisions this broadly. This ruling may however provide an opportunity for appellate courts to fashion at least a modified version of the rule and, if so, the case may have utility beyond its own facts.

Accordingly, the motion to suppress illegally seized evidence is denied and the evidence is admitted. It establishes beyond a reasonable doubt the defendant's guilt of possession of cocaine with the intent to distribute as charged in Count II of the indictment. The defendant is guilty as charged. He is free to pursue the other remedies available to him for the violation of his Fourth Amendment rights.

It is so ordered this 28th day of November 1983.

RALPH G. THOMPSON,
U.S. District Judge.

[From the Oklahoma City Journal Record, Nov. 29, 1983]

"BAD" SEARCH CRIMINAL EVIDENCE IS ADMITTED

(By Gail Mitchell)

Criminal evidence obtained in a "bad" search can be admitted into evidence in a trial under certain circumstances, U.S. District Judge Ralph G. Thompson ruled Monday.

In his ruling, Thompson broadened the court's exceptions to the 69-year-old "exclusionary rule" which prevents the use of illegally seized evidence in a trial.

Only one circuit has established a "good faith exception" to the exclusionary rule, Thompson said, but no such exception has been practiced in 10th Circuit.

"By applying the exclusionary rule, only the undeniably guilty defendant will benefit by the exclusion of valid evidence establishing his guilt," Thompson said.

"As a practical consequence . . ., society will be harmed by being denied protection it is due from the criminal justice system," Thompson said. "It will free the guilty, produce a result that appears fictitious and absurd and foster disrespect for the law."

The judge's ruling stems from a criminal indictment against Merle Ellis Owens for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

During a search of Owens' hotel room, several police officers searched the room and found drug-related paraphernalia.

They opened a dresser drawer and in it found two closed bags containing cocaine.

The search and seizure were conducted without a search warrant.

Owens claimed his Fourth Amendment rights were violated.

However, rather than treating the civil rights violation issue in court, Thompson suggested that it should be pursued in a civil suit.

Thompson found that even though 2.3 ounces of cocaine worth about $60,000 was seized illegally, it could be admitted into evidence.

As a result of the admission of the evidence, Thompson found Owens guilty of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

Owens earlier had waived his right to a jury trial.

The cocaine offered as evidence against Owens was seized by police as the result of an unauthorized search, Thompson said in his 12-page opinion and order.

Had the "exclusionary rule" been applied absolutely, the evidence of guilt would have been excluded and the defendant acquitted.

The "exclusionary rule" was initially established to protect the individual's privacy as secured by the Fourth Amendment.

"However, decisions of the court increasingly question the efficacy of the rule for this purpose and express concern for the high price society is paying for the doubtful beneficial effects it is providing. . .," Thompson said.

Protecting citizens from unlawful police conduct is necessary, but Thompson concluded that the rule need not be applied as a reflex action.

The exclusionary rule is not the only remedy that can be applied for a Fourth Amendment violation, Thompson said.

Among the remedies available for such violations are civil suits for money damages against the erring officers, state and federal and their employing agencies, Thompson said.

Thompson said he found that the officers in the case acted in the reasonable good faith that their act was proper, and that the good faith exception applies.

Even without the good faith exception, under these circumstances, Thompson said he found that no application of the rule is justified.

[From the Oklahoma City Times, Nov. 30, 1983]

STRIKING A BLOW FOR JUSTICE

The gaping legal loophole providing escape from conviction for numerous criminals for seven decades was at least partially closed by a bold, courageous ruling by a federal judge in Oklahoma City.

The momentous decision by U.S. District Judge Ralph G. Thompson holding that the so-called search and seizure exclusionary rule at times is unreasonable strikes a major blow for the public in its fight against crime.

The exclusionary rule, born in a 1914 U.S. Supreme Court case, was intended to discourage unlawful conduct by federal officers in search and seizure. The rule was expanded to cover state and local police in 1961.

It provides in essence that illegally obtained evidence cannot be used in prosecution of a case. Through the years it has been used as a legal technicality permitting crooks to beat the rap and go free.

President Reagan and U.S. Attorney General William French Smith have called for changes in the rule, several bills have been introduced in Congress to allow so-called "good faith" exceptions and the U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to consider an exception.

A ruling in the U.S. 5th Circuit adopted such an exception, but Judge Thompson's decision was the first for the 10th Circuit, which includes Oklahoma.

Thompson's ruling came in a federal cocaine conspiracy case against a former Oklahoma City firefighter. The cocaine was found in two cloth bags inside a closed drawer in the suspect's motel room. In plain view, a loaded pistol, marijuana and drug paraphernalia also were seized by police officers who had not obtained a search warrant and were arresting the man on an unrelated matter.

If the judge had applied the exclusionary rule like countless other cases through the years, he would have been forced to toss out the charges as a violation of the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution.

Instead, he held that the exclusionary rule at times provides an unreasonable and unacceptable windfall to the guilty. The judge's 12-page memorandum and order stated:

"In the absence of a demonstrated need to apply the exclusionary rule for an egregious violation of the Fourth Amendment by police officers, a guilty defendant should have no greater rights, benefits or remedies than innocent victims.

"By applying the exclusionary rule, only the undeniably guilty defendant will benefit by the exclusion of valid evidence establishing his guilt."

The judge wisely pointed out there are other legal remedies, such as civil lawsuits against officers, that can be taken while incriminating evidence is kept intact for use in prosecution of those suspected of committing a crime.

U.S. Attorney William S. Price of Oklahoma City lauded Judge Thompson's ruling and pledged his support of the decision if it is appealed to a higher court.

The nation's highest court could use an appeal of the ruling to modify the exclusionary rule for the entire United States. It is long overdue.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, there are several parts of this decision that I wish to draw to the Senate's attention. Judge Ralph Thompson points out what is oftentimes overlooked, that "the exclusionary rule is not a part of the fourth amendment itself." Therefore a statutory limitation can be in order.

Judge Thompson notes that the facts in the Owens case are such that "by applying the exclusionary rule only the undeniably guilty defendant will benefit by the exclusion of valid evidence establishing his guilt."

Furthermore, he concludes that "the fundamental purpose of a trial, being a search for the truth, will be obstructed. It will free the guilty, produce a result that appears fictitious and absurd and foster disrespect for the law."

There is overwhelming support for a good faith exception to the exclusionary rule. Judge Thompson's ruling received a very favorable response from both the media and the public in my home State.

Mr. President, I support passage of S. 1764. This bill will help restore the balance between the rights of an accused and of the public to a fair trial.

Mr. President, I would like to ask just one question of the manager of the bill, Senator THURMOND. I want to confirm my understanding of how the good faith exception would apply. Does the language of S. 1764 allow for this good faith exception to apply both in cases where there is a search warrant and in cases where there is not a search warrant?

Mr. THURMOND. It would apply in both cases, when a search warrant was used and in cases where a search warrant was not used.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, I again want to congratulate Senator THURMOND for his efforts in bringing this issue before us and I now ask unanimous consent to be added as a cosponsor.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—S. 1764

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a unanimous-consent request in respect to this bill, that is the exclusionary rule bill, that I hope will meet the approval of all Senators. I have discussed this at length with the minority leader. Both sides I believe have worked their clearance processes, so I hope it will be granted.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, in connection with the consideration of the bill now pending, S. 1764, the exclusionary rule bill, the debate be limited to 5 hours on the bill to be controlled in the following manner: 1 hour under the control of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. THURMOND, or his designee; 1 hour under the control of the ranking minority member, Mr. BIDEN, or his designee; 1 hour under the control of the Senator from Maryland, Mr. MATHIAS, or his designee; 1 hour under the control of the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. BUMPERS, or his designee; and 1 hour under the control of the Senator from Maine, Mr. MITCHELL, or his designee.

I further ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that on any motions, appeals, or points of order that may be submitted to the Senate there be a time limitation of 20 minutes to be equally divided with the control of the time in the usual form.

I further ask unanimous consent that no amendments be in order to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank all Senators. I especially thank the minority leader and the two managers of the bill.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to S. 1764, a bill which would limit the application of the exclusionary rule. S. 1764 provides that evidence obtained as a result of search and seizure and which is otherwise admissible shall not be excluded in a proceeding in a court of the United States if the search and seizure was undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Under this bill, a showing that evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant constitutes prima facie evidence of such a reasonable good faith belief.

Mr. President, as I did when the habeas corpus bill was before us, I question why we are even dealing with a bill of this type, not to mention rushing it through here with a minimum of debate. This legislation, in my opinion, Mr. President, is unconstitutional and clearly violates the intent of the founders of our Constitution to protect the privacy rights of all Americans.

The fourth amendment guarantees:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The essential question is does the fourth amendment mandate the exclusionary rule? If the answer is no, then the Congress is in a position to modify it. If the answer is yes, then the only role the Congress can play within its proper constitutional sphere is through the constitutional amendment process. I firmly believe the fourth amendment does mandate the exclusionary rule, and I frankly cannot believe that any serious reading of Mapp against Ohio could produce any other answer. In Mapp against Ohio, the Supreme Court majority stated that the exclusionary rule was a "constitutionally required * * * deterrent safeguard without * * * which the fourth amendment would have been reduced to a 'form of words.'"

Any decision as to whether the exclusionary rule should be altered belongs in the courts, not the Congress. In fact the decision is before the Supreme Court today. U.S. against Leon and Massachusetts against Sheppard are both cases pending before the Supreme Court which deal with the good faith exception to the fourth amendment exclusionary rule. Why not let the Supreme Court decide? What is the source of this overpowering urge to legislate on this issue when, first, our authority to make such decisions is at the very least in doubt; and second, the legitimate constitutional authority is about to rule on this very matter? Mr. President, what we have here is a not so subtle form of the device of court stripping, on which the Senate spent many months of cloture votes and late nights during the 98th Congress.

The courts have not been silent on the so-called good faith test. For over 100 years a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States has consistently rejected the test. When the Court ruled, back in 1914 in Weeks against United States, that evidence seized in violation of the fourth amendment would not be admitted in Federal criminal trials, Justice Day wrote:

> The tendency of those who execute the criminal laws of the country to obtain conviction by means of unlawful seizures * * * should find no sanction in the judgments of the courts which are charged at all times with the support of the Constitution and to which people of all conditions have a right to appeal for the maintenance of such fundamental rights.

In Beck against Ohio, Mr. Justice Stewart stated:

> * * * if subjective good faith alone was the test, the projections of the Fourth Amendment would evaporate, and the people would be "secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects" only in the discretion of the police.

When the Justice Department raised the good faith exception over 20 years ago, the counsel for a petitioner stated:

> We have no doubt that the Court will reject this all too obviously last-ditch alternative. A search is either valid or in-valid; there is no middle ground. Close cases will of course arise in the future as indeed they have in the past; but however difficult it may be to draw the line, a line must somewhere be drawn. An illegal search can no more be saved from condemnation by the apologetic comment that it is only slightly unconstitutional than an egg can be classed as edible simply because it is only slightly rotten.

As for the merits of this so-called solution, those who support S. 1764 will say that the exclusionary rule is responsible for an excessive number of criminals going free on technicalities. But the fact is, according to a survey by the Institute for Law and Social Research "less than 1 percent of all arrests were refused by the prosecutor with an indication that the police failed to protect the arrestee's right to due process."

These findings are substantiated in a 1979 GAO study conducted to determine the "Impact of the Exclusionary Rule on Federal Criminal Prosecutions." GAO analyzed 2,804 defendant cases handled from July 1 through August 31, 1978, in the offices of 38 U.S. attorneys. The results of this study revealed:

Sixteen percent of the defendants whose cases were accepted for prosecution filed some type of suppression motion.

Eleven percent of the defendants whose cases were accepted for prosecution filed fourth amendment suppression motions.

Thirty-three percent of the defendants who went to trial filed fourth amendment suppression motions; most defendants had formal hearings on their motions; however, the overwhelming majority of these motions were denied.

Four-tenths of 1 percent of the declined defendants' cases were declined due to fourth amendment search and seizure problems.

These statistics hardly indicate an excessive number of criminals going free on technicalities.

Rather than refine the law and insure the administration of justice, changes in the fourth amendment exclusionary rule could, in fact, encourage violations of the law. In its amicus curiae brief on the Supreme Court case of the State of Illinois against Lance and Susan Gates, the American Bar Association wrote:

Police and prosecutors, who are now encouraged to make careful assessments of what the Fourth Amendment permits and what it forbids, would be motivated whenever there was doubt to construe the law generously in favor of the right to search and seize. And the occasions when "doubt" could be found would surely increase as its benefits become apparent:

The changes proposed in S. 1764 could have the unfortunate consequence of undermining the public trust and respect for the law and law enforcement officers. One attorney has pointed out that the good faith exception to the exclusionary role.

* * * will create one set of laws for those in power and another for those not in power. It will give permission for one class of citizens to violate the Constitution and be rewarded while others who break the law are to be punished * * * Under the good faith exception a court, at the very time that it declared that an officer had acted in an unconstitutional manner, would nonetheless deprive its own declaration—of any practical meaning by approving the use of the wrongfully seized evidence.

Almost 100 years ago in Boyd against United States, Mr. Justice Bradley said:

Constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and liberal construction deprives them of half their efficacy, and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of the courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon.

I suggest we heed Justice Bradley's words and entrust any changes to the exclusionary rule to the courts where they belong.

In closing, Mr. President, I want to read a quotation from President Washington's Farewell Address which speaks to us about the role we as legislators should play:

It is important * * * that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism.

If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way in which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Mr. President, this bill is such a case. I urge my colleagues to heed Washington's warning notwithstanding our desire to pass a crime package so we can appear to be anticrime. With the habeas corpus reform and exclusionary rule reform, both of which raise critical separation of powers questions while neither responds to or solves a clear problem, this package will be far tougher on the Constitution than it will be on crime. I urge my colleagues to defeat this bill.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I support this bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code by adding a new section 3505, to chapter 223 to limit the application of the fourth amendment exclusionary rule in Federal court proceedings. The bill will provide that evidence obtained as a result of a search and seizure and which is otherwise admissible shall not be excluded in a proceeding in a court of the United States if the search and seizure was undertaken in a reasonable, good-faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment.

The exclusionary rule is a judicially created rule under which evidence is barred from introduction at a proceeding such as a criminal trial if the evidence is determined to have been obtained as a result of a search or seizure that violated the first clause of the fourth amendment. The rule is of comparatively recent vintage and was not even applied by the Supreme Court in the context of the fourth amendment until 1914, 123 years after the fourth amendment was adopted; it has only been held applicable to State criminal proceedings for the past 22 years.

There are no constitutional or statutory provisions which specifically set limits on what is meant by an unreasonable search or seizure. Instead the law in this area is an amalgam of cases dealing with a vast range of issues relating to the undertaking of searches and seizures. Yet courts continue to apply the rule even as they continue to develop the law of search and seizures. The heart of the present problem in application of the rule is that it has been expanded gradually by the courts to apply in situations in which the rule cannot possibly serve its primary purpose of deterring police misconduct. In my experience as a former prosecutor, I have seen this distortion of the rule's purpose result in grave injustice as well as a substantial cost to our society as law enforcement officers and private citizens alike have lost faith in our criminal justice system. I have seen, as the Supreme Court has stated, that the rule "deflects the truthfinding process and often frees the guilty."

This bill is intended to enhance the operation of the Federal criminal justice system by allowing courts greater access to all reliable evidence relevant in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and to promote renewed respect for that system as a search for the truth in the minds of our citizens. It is intended to aid the courts in that search for the truth and in criminal cases, where the police have reasonably tried to apply the complex law of search and seizure, insure that the guilty are convicted and the innocent are acquitted.

This bill will not eliminate the exclusionary rule. Rather it will eliminate the disproportionate application of the rule, and the disrespect for the law that application engenders. We must allow the courts to grant a remedy for the violations of fourth amendment rights which matches the seriousness of the violation.

Our system of justice was established with the determination of truth as its primary goal. Under this system the State has the burden of proving the guilt or innocence of the accused. The assumption is that through the examination of all of the evidence gathered by the State, the court will be led to a decision which is as close to the truth as humanly possible. But the exclusionary rule often thwarts the possibility of such examination. The truth-seeking process can be greatly compromised by the function of the exclusionary rule.

The Supreme Court first suggested possible judicial action as a means to curtail continued abuses of authority by law enforcement agencies 96 years ago in Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886). This resulted in the Court later instituting the so-called exclusionary rule, in lieu of any constitutional sanction, in Weeks v. United States, 223 U.S. 383 (1914). This judicially mandated doctrine was intended to serve as a deterrent to abusive Federal law enforcement practices. The rule, also referred to as the Weeks doctrine or the suppression doctrine, was subsequently extended to encompass the States in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

Let me again emphasize that the exclusionary rule is a concept of judicial origin, created supposedly to protect the rights guaranteed by the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 14th amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The exclusionary rule is not an obligatory element of the fourth amendment, but merely the means which the Court in Weeks chose to adopt to enforce the guarantees of the fourth amendment. The Court reasoned that exclusion was the only sanction or remedy that would effectively compel respect for and secure policy compliance with the rights guaranteed by the fourth amendment. An analysis of recent Court decisions clearly indicates that this is not the view held by the majority of justices on the current Court. As stated in a past decision of the Court with respect to the exclusionary rule, "the rule is calculated to prevent, not repair. Its purpose is to deter—to compel respect for the constitutional guaranty in the only effectively available way—by removing the incentive to disregard it." Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. at 217 (1960).

From its inception, the exclusionary rule has drawn extensive criticism for the flaws in logic and operation inherent in the premise on which the rule is based: deterrence. The logic of this deterrence theory was severely questioned nearly 30 years ago, when Justice Jackson noted:

> That the rule of exclusion and the reversal results in the escape of a guilty person is more capable of demonstration than that it deters invasions of right by the police. The case is made, so far as the police are concerned, when they announce that they have arrested their man. Rejection of the evidence does nothing to punish the wrongdoing official, while it may, and likely will, remedy against one lawbreaker because he has been pursued by another. It protects one against whom incriminating evidence is discovered, but does nothing to protect innocent persons who are the victims of illegal but fruitless searches. The disciplinary or educational effect of the court's releasing the defendant for police misbehavior is to indirect as to be no more than a mild deterrent at best. Irvine v. California, 347 U.S. 128, 135 (1954).

Later, 10 years after the rule had been applied to the States, Dallin Oaks did an exhaustive study in search of the so-called deterrent effect. This is his conclusion.

> Today, more than fifty years after the exclusionary rule was adopted for the federal courts and almost a decade after it was imposed upon the state courts, there is still no convincing evidence to verify the factual premise of deterrence upon which the rule is based or to determine the limits of its effectiveness. 37 Univ. of Chicago L. Rev. 665, 672 (1970).

This conclusion is just as valid today. The Attorney General's Task Force on Violent Crime recently faulted the exclusionary rule with "barring evidence of the truth, however important, if there is any investigative error, however unintended or trivial." Task Force Final Report, page 55.

Many of the cases to which the rule is applied involve unintentional violations of the fourth amendment protections, such as technical errors in the filing or serving of the search warrant. It is impossible to deter actions which are either unintentional or performed with the belief that they are in compliance with the standards required by the fourth amendment. Justice Cardozo summarized the rule's flaws in authoring a unanimous opinion for the New York Court of Appeals, in People v. Defore, 244 U.S. 13 (1926).

> The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered.

Rather than subsiding, the criticisms of the exclusionary rule have augmented in recent years, particularly since the 1961 decision in Mapp. This is perhaps a reflection of Justice Holmes' statement that "the life of law is not logic; it is experience."

Efforts to repeal the rule have been thwarted in the past by the widely held misconception that the rule is constitutionally mandated and that its repeal is somehow tantamount to a repeal of the fourth amendment. However, the Court itself recognizes that:

> The rule is a judicially created remedy designed to safeguard fourth amendment rights generally through its deterrent effect, rather than a personal constitutional right of the party aggrieved. (U.S. v. Calandra, 414 U.S. at 348 (1974).)

The costs of the exclusionary rule were recognized in Stone v. Powell, 49 L.Ed. 2d 1067 (1976):

First, the focus of the trial, and the attention of the participants therein, is diverted from the ultimate question of guilt or innocence that should be the central concern in a criminal proceeding—that is, it deflects the truth-finding process and often frees the guilty.

Second, the evidence excluded is typically reliable and extremely probative.

Third, the concept of proportionality is often offended. "The disparity in particular cases between the error committed by the police officer and the windfall afforded a guilty defendant by application of the rule is contrary to the idea of proportionality that is essential to the concept of justice." This in turn may generate disrespect for the law and the administration of justice.

The list of critics and criticisms grows steadily and becomes increasingly more persuasive with every assertion that the rule releases countless guilty criminals (Chief Justice Burger, 403 U.S. at 416).

I urge my colleagues who are concerned about crime in America and the perception people have of our legal justice system, to support this bill.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I will vote for S. 1764, the Exclusionary Rule Limitation Act of 1983, because in an important way the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule which is established in S. 1764 strengthens the assumption that lies behind the rule—that the rule is necessary in order to deter unlawful police conduct which violates the fourth amendment.

Passage of this bill will, I believe, undermine future attacks by opponents of the exclusionary rule since S. 1764 recognizes the value of the exclusionary rule as a deterrent.

In the absence of a warrant the amendment requires the prosecution show that an illegal search was reasonable and in good faith. That burden of proof is where it should be and without it being on the prosecution, I would not be able to support this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we are ready for any who care to speak against the bill. If they will come forward, we will be glad to have them do so.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time now run against the two Senators who have 1 hour each, to be equally divided, the time to run against them, unless they come in and speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are five Senators who have control of the time under the agreement.

Mr. THURMOND. We are waiting on Senator BUMPERS and Senator MITCHELL who oppose this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent that the time be charged evenly against all?

Mr. THURMOND. Against those who oppose this bill and who have not spoken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut reserves the right to object.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time be charged against all those who have not spoken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. SPECTER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, while we are waiting for those who oppose the bill to come to the floor, I shall go ahead and use such time as may be required.

Mr. President, the Justice Department has favored this bill and I would like to read a letter from them.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This in response to your request for Department comments concerning S. 1764 to reform the exclusionary rule. In summary, the bill would eliminate the application of the exclusionary rule in federal courts in situations where its purpose—deterrence of misconduct by the police—could not be served.

The Department regards this bill as one of the most significant parts of its anti-crime legislative program. It would enhance the operation of the Federal criminal justice system by allowing courts greater access to all reliable evidence relevant in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and, of equal importance, would promote renewed respect for the criminal justice system in the minds of our citizens. Frankly, both our law enforcement officers and the general public are deeply concerned over the present application of the rule which can operate to exclude relevant and probative evidence of a defendant's guilt in situations where the police who seized the evidence acted reasonably in doing so but discover, sometimes years later, that a court decision that had not even been handed down at the time of the search has rendered their actions improper.

We recognize that the right of our citizens to be free of unreasonable searches and seizures is a cornerstone of personal liberty and S. 1764 does not interfere with this right. Rather, it provides that evidence which is obtained as a result of a search or seizure and which is otherwise admissible shall not be excluded in a federal court proceeding "if the search or seizure was undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the Constitution of the United States." This limitation on the rule will restrict it to situations in which it will actually achieve its purpose of deterring unlawful police conduct. Conduct entered into in the reasonable, good faith belief that it was lawful cannot, by definition, be deterred. S. 1764 would, therefore, eliminate the unjustifiable acquittal of obviously guilty defendants in situations where the rule has been expanded by the courts from its deterrence rationale to apply in cases where it could not possibly deter the police from acting as they did.

Although our proposal has been questioned by some as being unconstitutional or as rewarding "police ignorance," we do not believe such contentions are tenable. In fact, the proposal is very similar to the exception to the rule already adopted by the Fifth Circuit en banc in United States v. Williams, 622 F. 2d 830 (1980) cert. denied 449 U.S. 1127 (1981), in a decision based upon a thorough analysis of relevant Supreme Court cases. The court in Williams also considered the contention that the good faith exception rewards "police ignorance" and noted that "the belief [of the officer that the search or seizure was permissible] in addition to being held in subjective good faith, must be grounded in an objective reasonableness. It must therefore be based upon articulable premises sufficient to cause a reasonable, and reasonably trained, officer to believe that he was acting lawfully." Williams p. 841 fn. 4a.

In sum, we concur with the Supreme Court that the exclusionary rule as currently applied "deflects the truthfinding process and often frees the guilty," Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465, 490 (1976). While S. 1764 will not eliminate the application of the rule, it will properly restrict its impact to those cases where it can in fact deter unlawful police conduct.

Mr. President, I should also like to state that the National Association of Attorneys General is in favor of this bill. I have a memorandum here to all U.S. Senators concerning S. 1764—the exclusionary rule.

We are informed that you will soon have an opportunity to vote on S. 1764, the Exclusionary Rule bill, and we strongly urge you to vote for it without weakening amendments. The Association has for several years supported amendments to the Exclusionary Rule which would allow for a good faith exception. The effect of this amendment would provide that evidence obtained in the course of a reasonable, good faith search should not be excluded from a criminal trial. This bill is intended to enhance the operation of the federal criminal justice system by allowing courts greater access to all reliable evidence relevant in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, thereby promoting renewed respect for our system of justice.

Attached for your consideration is a copy of the Association's policy position on the Exclusionary Rule.

If we can be helpful to you in any way during your deliberations and debates of the bill, we would be grateful for the opportunity to provide any assistance you may require.

And that is signed by C. Raymond Marvin, executive director and general counsel of the National Association of Attorneys General.

Mr. President, at the 1981 midterm meeting of the National Association of Attorneys General held at the Royal Sonesta Hotel, New Orleans, La., December 1 to 4, 1981, a resolution on the exclusionary rule was passed:

Whereas the fundamental and legitimate purpose of the exclusionary rule, to deter illegal police conduct and promote respect for the rule of law by preventing illegally obtained evidence from being used in a criminal trial has been eroded by action of the courts barring introduction of evidence of the truth, however important, if there is any investigative error, however unintended or trivial; and

Whereas, any remedy for the violation of a constitutional right should be proportional to the magnitude of the violation; and

Whereas, evidence should not be excluded from a criminal proceeding if it has been obtained by a law enforcement officer acting in a reasonable, good faith belief that the evidence was obtained in conformity with the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution; and

Whereas, a showing that evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant should constitute prima facie evidence of such a good faith belief; and

Now, therefore, be it resolved, That the National Association of Attorneys General supports legislation that would provide that evidence obtained in the course of a reasonable, good faith search should not be excluded from criminal trials; and

Be it further resolved, That the Association authorizes its General Counsel to transmit these views to the Congress, the Administration, and other interested individuals.

Mr. President, we see that the Justice Department, which is responsible for the Federal Criminal law enforcement in this country supports this bill. We also see that the National Association of Attorneys General representing the States of the Nation has come out strongly, rendering a statement and also passing a resolution, in favor of this bill. I hope the Senate will see fit to pass it.

At this time I see the distinguished ranking member of the committee, who I understand desires to speak on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I do not believe anyone who has worked in law enforcement or in the court system as either a prosecutor or a defense attorney, as the occupant of the chair has or as the chairman of the full committee or as I have, can be satisfied with the state of the search and seizure law in the United States of America. While the fourth amendment itself is quite clear, its application by the courts has become at times a real minefield for law enforcement officers. The fourth amendment reads as follows:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Mr. President, in 1914, the Supreme Court in the Weeks case decided the obvious: While the amendment is very clear on its face, it is not self-enforcing, and that some mechanism is needed to be established to give life to its provisions. And the Court established the so-called exclusionary rule.

The rule has been much criticized over the last 70 years. It does appear unfair on its face as Justice Cardoza was fond of saying to free a defendant in a serious crime because "the constable had blundered."

The Supreme Court has been in a quandary ever since 1914. There has to be some effective mechanism for enforcing the fourth amendment, and yet there does not seem to be any alternative to the exclusionary rule. Chief Justice Burger pleaded with the Congress in the early 1970's in the Bivens case to develop amendments to the Federal torts claims statute to create a more effective civil remedy against the Federal Government for law enforcement abuses so that it might serve as an alternative to the exclusionary rule at least in Federal cases. We on the Judiciary Committee have developed such amendments and are in total agreement on how to deal with Federal law enforcement officials but are in disagreement over non-law-enforcement officials of the Federal Government. It is indeed unfortunate that we have not enacted such legislation, because I think it would take the Supreme Court out of its quandary and we could move on reform, perhaps even abolition of the exclusionary rule, at least with respect to Federal officials.

To amplify that point slightly, the chairman of the committee; Senator GRASSLEY, who is the chairman of the subcommittee, and I have worked for hours in trying to fashion a compromise on the Tort Claims Act. We are awfully close. But the Justice Department continues, in my view, as I characterize it, to recede in the wrong direction in terms of working out a compromise. We reported out of the Judiciary Committee a Torts Claims Act that I think we could pass on the floor today or tomorrow, in 10 minutes; but the Justice Department has indicated that it will not buy that. In an attempt to accommodate their concerns, we have worked tirelessly to work out a compromise. I am sorry we were unable to do it.

I think it would have been more appropriate if we had gone the route of just dealing for now on the part we could agree on, and that is with Federal law enforcement officers, rather than dealing with changes in the Federal Torts Claims Act with respect to non-law-enforcement officials of the Federal Government.

There is a feeling among some that if we just take care of the law enforcement side, which I believe would elucidate this issue a great deal, we would never get to the rest of the reforms required under the Torts Claims Act.

Because we have not moved on this, I offer that as the first reason why it is premature to move on the exclusionary rule at this time.

Again, I want to make it clear that I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee or any of those who believe in and are proposing the changes that are encompassed in this exclusionary rule bill. In part of an elaborate agreement that took over 2½ years to work out, we accomplished a great deal by passing what I think most would agree—notwithstanding some individual Members of the House of Representatives—is the most comprehensive anticrime package that has passed the Senate since I have been here, and I have been here more than 11 years.

So we agreed, in the context of that agreement, that we would then move to the six or seven controversial measures. This is one of those. We tried very hard—and I must say, to the credit of the chairman, that he tried hard—to get the tort claims question resolved first. Whether that would have changed his mind on this, I am not prepared to say—I suspect that it might not have—but the effort was made. It was not accomplished, and here we are, moving on the exclusionary rule bill at this time, as part of the agreement.

I would argue—and think this is in keeping with the agreement—that it is legislatively premature, in summary, because the Chief Justice suggested that we develop an alternative remedy to the exclusionary rule. We have not done so, and I think we are running the risk of the courts telling us, "Well, you haven't helped us out very much here at the court because you haven't developed an alternative remedy for enforcement of the fourth amendment."

This leads to a second and even more compelling reason why we should not be doing this bill right now in its present form. The Supreme Court, in both the last term and the current term, has been looking for the right case to review, apparently with the intent to unmake or remake the judge-made exclusionary rule. It is not just constitutional good sense but commonsense to allow the arm of Government, which has created the mess in fourth amendment law to straighten it up. In the Gates case last year, the court unfortunately put itself in a procedural box such that it could not decide whether there is or should be a good faith defense for policemen under the fourth amendment and the exclusionary rule.

Some of my colleagues may not follow this area very much. I am not being critical when I say that. There are aspects of energy legislation and aspects of highway legislation and aspects of food and drug legislation but I do not follow very closely because I am not on those committees. But I say to my colleagues: Go back to the relationship to the Tort Claims Act. If, in fact, there were a remedy under the law whereby an individual could move against the Government for an illegal action taken by a police officer, in the case where the police officer suggested it was shown that there was a good faith exception, where he, in good faith, instituted what eventually became a constitutional violation as determined by a court, then at least in that instance we would be able to deal with the guaranteed right under the fourth amendment against illegal search and seizure. There would be some recourse for the constitutional violation, some recourse potentially short of exclusion of the evidence.

So while it had to decide the Gates case on other grounds, the Supreme Court immediately scheduled for argument two other cases that squarely place at issue the very substance of what the proponents of this bill say they want to accomplish. Indeed only a few weeks ago the Court heard arguments in both the Shepard and the Leon cases. In both cases the question for the Court to decide is whether the exclusionary rule requires that illegally seized evidence be excluded if the search or seizure was undertaken in a reasonable good faith belief that it was in conformity with the Constitution. In both cases law enforcement officers went through the warrant procedures but in both cases the warrants which were issued were invalid but the officers proceeded in good faith to execute them. This is the classic case where a technical violation ought not result in exclusion.

I believe that most experts agree that the Court will develop some type of good faith exception. We should not proceed with this bill until we know exactly what the parameters of that good faith defense is going to be. It will surely apply to warrants but the Court may set out some different standard for warrantless searches. That standard may very well be inconsistent with the bill we have before us today.

I think it is unfair to law enforcement officials to get their hopes up that we are somehow solving their problems by enacting this legislation when it may be struck down by the Court—first, because we have not created the alternative remedy I mentioned earlier, but, second, because in our haste to act we could not wait a few months to hear what the Supreme Court obviously wants to say on the matter. After all we have waited 70 years, why can we not wait, at most 10 months so we can see what the Court is going to do?

This leads me to a third point about this bill. Most law enforcement officials I talk to think that in enacting this legislation we will somehow be affecting how the cop on the beat in Wilmington, Del., or Philadelphia, Pa., or St. Louis, Mo., or any town in South Carolina is doing his job. Nothing is further from the truth. This bill only affects Federal law enforcement officials. It will have no impact on how local law enforcement officials, who are on the front lines in 94 percent of all crimes conduct their jobs. Incidentally, the Supreme Court decision will have an impact on local law enforcement, because the cases in front of them are local cases. That is another reason for delay.

I think we will cause significant confusion if we pass this bill, even if it gets through the House of Representatives, about which I have serious doubts, and is signed by the President. We are going to send a signal to law enforcement agencies that we really have done something to help them in their local jurisdictions, when in fact we will not have done a darn thing.

Finally, there is an even more compelling case for not voting for this legislation. The primary criticism of the exclusionary rule and the court's decisions under the fourth amendment is that they are confusing. That is a criticism that I strongly support and I believe that the court could go a long way to cleaning that up in the cases it has before it. But I believe that what we are doing in this bill may actually be a cure worse than the disease because it will create greater confusion in fourth amendment law.

Two of the most vociferous opponents of the exclusionary rule and proponents of its abolition actually made a strong case against this particular bill in our hearings last year. Steven Schlesinger, Director of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Justice and Judge Malcolm Wilkey both made essentially the same point. Under this new bill we are going to have decades of litigation over what kind of searches are going to be considered on their face good faith and which kinds are bad faith.

In Schlesinger's words, enactment of a good faith exception would build an unsatisfactory half-way house between retention and abolition of the rule.

Judge Wilkey says:

(U)nlike many compromises, this is the kind of compromise which may be as disastrous as trying to make the grand canyon in two jumps.

Of course most of these proponents of change would completely abolish the exclusionary rule, a position which I could not support; which would probably not be supported by the Judiciary Committee and would I believe be rejected by the Supreme Court.

I think it is important to point out that even those who do support total abolition acknowledge this creates great confusion.

The right way to go on this issue is to resolve our differences on tort claims by limiting our changes to Federal law enforcement officials and forget about nonlaw enforcement officials, if we cannot work it all out, and forget about nonlaw enforcement agencies for the time being and go back and deal with nonlaw enforcement agencies in a Tort Claims Act at a later day—when I say later, I do not mean later 4 years from now, I mean later this year—but to move now on the Tort Claims Act as it affects law enforcement officers the changes that we voted out of committee. Get that enacted quickly so that there is an alternative in place right now for the exclusionary rule in Federal cases. Wait for further action in actually finetuning the rule in either Federal or State cases until the Supreme Court rules in the Shepard and Leon cases. That way we will act in a deliberate manner and we may actually create some order in fourth amendment law, where some would argue little exists now. That would be a great contribution to Federal and State law enforcement officials alike and I think it would demonstrate to all that we have some sense about what we are doing in this body.

To sum it up, Mr. President, I think it is a serious mistake when the Supreme Court has made it as clear as they can even make it clear what they are looking for and they have now two cases on all fours to deal with the question of the exclusionary rule for us in Congress to be making a judgment now which may be undone before it gets across the other side of this building. Second, it is more important to put in place the relief for law enforcement officers which this is really about so they have some sense of what they can and cannot, should and should not do, by amending the Tort Claims Act before we deal with this legislation.

Mr. President, I see others of my colleagues here in the Chamber; consequently, I reserve the remainder of my time and I yield whatever time the Senator from Missouri may take, as long as he wishes.

I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Delaware and I compliment him on a truly excellent presentation.

I simply wish that more people were giving attention to this subject matter which would considerably erode the exclusionary rule and thus endanger the protection afforded individuals through the fourth amendment.

The argument that deterrence of illegal police conduct is often outweighed by costs to society of useful, probative evidence, is an old one. Another familiar argument is that the liberal application of the exclusionary rule is no longer needed because today police and other law enforcement officers are better trained and more careful—and thus more likely to heed the fourth amendment prohibition against unlawful searches and seizures.

I reject these and other arguments which would support a good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule for four reasons. First, although the exclusionary rule might be judicially implied, it is constitutionally required by the fourth amendment. In view of this I have grave reservations about whether Congress has the authority to alter, by legislation, a constitutionally impelled protection.

Second, the consistent application of the exclusionary rule explains precisely why police conduct in search and seizure cases has so vastly improved. It is obvious that the sanction of exclusion of illegally obtained evidence has provided a powerful incentive for law enforcement officers to respect the privacy rights protected under the fourth amendment. Removing much of this incentive would clearly take its toll. Adopting this weakening exception would send a dangerous signal to the law enforcement community.

Third, an exception to the exclusionary rule based on the reasonable, good-faith belief of a police officer—a subjective test—would require probing into the mind of that officer, a nearly impossible task, and one which might trigger prolonged litigation.

Fourth, and finally, the Supreme Court during the present term will decide two cases bearing on this issue, and will consider adopting some limited good-faith exception. It makes sense to await judicial resolution so close at hand. But it also makes enormous sense to allow the Supreme Court to rule on this issue which so drastically affects what I consider to be a constitutional question—rather than acting improperly through legislation.

I urge my colleagues to vote against this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY MEMBERS OF THE TURKISH NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are today honored by the presence of a distinguished delegation from the Turkish National Assembly

Of course, Mr. President, any delegation of parliamentarians is welcome in the Chamber but a particular welcome is extended to those parliamentarians who represent our allies within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

So I hope that Senators will all join in extending a particular welcome to the members of the Turkish National Assembly who are with us today.

RECESS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess for a few minutes while we meet our guests.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, at 4:35 p.m., recessed until 4:38 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. SPECTER).

EXCLUSIONARY RULE LIMITATION ACT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we are ready to proceed. If those who wish to oppose the bill will come and speak, we can get through earlier.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President. I rise in support of this bill to restructure the exclusionary rule. The exclusionary rule, also known as the suppression doctrine, strikes at the fundamental tenet of our system of criminal justice that the guilt or innocence of any accused individual should be ascertained by a thorough consideration of all relevant evidence. The exclusionary rule is a judge-made policy mandating the inadmissibility in court of any evidence obtained in violation of the fourth amendment's reasonableness standard. As the doctrine now operates, an individual who may have in fact committed a grisly violent crime may be set free, not because he is innocent but because a judge determines that the evidence necessary to prove his guilt was acquired in an unreasonable manner. In the memorable words of Justice (then judge) Cardozo: "The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered." People v. Defore, 242 N.Y., 13, 21 (1926). Thus, this rule operates to free the guilty, even when the constable's only blunder might be an inadvertent technical defect in a search warrant. To remedy this absurd situation, I strongly support this legislation.

Early in the consideration of this legislation, I must indicate that my own preference would be to entirely eliminate the suppression doctrine. Indeed I introduced legislation early this Congress and in previous Congresses to achieve that objective. Under my bill, the rule would be replaced with two ways to effectively enforce the fourth amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches. In the first place, any violation of this amendment to the Constitution would give rise to a civil suit for damages against the offending police officer. Interestingly an excellent case can be made that this is exactly the enforcement mechanism contemplated by the Framers of the fourth amendment. As discussed in the South Texas Law Journal, officers of the King were successfully sued for offensive searches in several renowned cases decided in 1765. See Rader, "Legislating a Remedy for the Fourth Amendment," 23 S. Tex. L. J. 585, 590–595 (1982). The Framers were undoubtedly aware of those cases and declined to specifically attach an enforcement clause to the fourth amendment because they were aware that the courts could use civil liability as an enforcement club. The second means of enforcing the fourth amendment in my bill would set up procedures to supply internal agency discipline against any officer who violated the Constitution. Such discipline could include suspension without pay, reductions in grade, and other sanctions for failure to abide by the Constitution's rules. With these alternative remedies in place and without any empirical showing that the exclusionary rule has successfully deterred fourth amendment violations—its only real purpose—it would make sense to eliminate the rule altogether.

This bill, however, does insure that the rule will not operate to exclude from trial probative evidence due to some police error when the police acted, albeit incorrectly, on the reasonable good-faith belief that their conduct was in compliance with the law. This is an important step toward the objective of abolishing the rule entirely. This will insure that minor, technical police mistakes, or even more substantial errors undertaken in good faith, do not result in dangerous criminals returning to the streets.

Although the fourth amendment triggers its judicial application, the exclusionary rule is not a part of the Constitution at all. In fact, it was not even created by the Federal courts until 1914. Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914). Moreover, it was not applied to the bulk of our Nation's criminal trials which are held in State courts until 1961. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). In short, it is not a doctrine of the Constitution, but a judicial experiment of recent vintage—an experiment furthermore which has failed.

The authoritative critics of the suppression doctrine are almost too numerous to mention. Each of these critics agree, however, with the thrust of the early research done by Dallin Oaks, now a Utah Supreme Court justice:

> More then fifty years after the exclusionary rule was adopted for the Federal courts and almost a decade after it was imposed upon the State courts, there is still no convincing evidence to verify the factual premise of deterrence upon which the rule is based or to determine the limits of its effectiveness. 37 U. Chic. L. Rev. 665, 753 (1970).

Even more than a decade after Oaks' research, his conclusion still holds. As authoritative and exhaustive as Oaks' research may be, there is still at least one more authoritative critic of the rule, namely the Supreme Court itself:

> The costs of the exclusionary rule . . . are well known: (1) The focus of the trial . . . is diverted from the ultimate question of guilt or innocence . . . (2) the physical evidence sought to be excluded is typically reliable and often the most probative evidence . . . (3) the rule . . . often frees the guilty . . . (4) the rule is contrary to the idea of proportionality that is essential to the concept of justice . . . (5) it may well have the effect . . . of generating disrespect for the law and the administration of justice. Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976).

Even the Supreme Court recognizes the flaws of the suppression doctrine and has trimmed it back in recent cases. See for example, Stone, id.

Whereas a law enforcement officer acting in violation of the fourth amendment should be held responsible for his actions, the exclusionary rule instead is custom made to deter the prosecutor, not those law enforcement officers guilty of committing the illegal acts. The exclusionary rule is succinctly explained by the distinguished legal authority Dean Wigmore:

> The Doctrine of Weeks v. United States also exemplifies a trait of our Anglo-American judiciary peculiar to the mechanical and unnatural type of justice. The natural way to do justice here would be to enforce the health principle of the fourth amendment directly, i.e., by sending for the high-handed, over-zealous marshal who had searched without a warrant, imposing a 30-day imprisonment for his contempt of the constitution, and then proceeding to affirm the sentence of the convicted criminal. But the proposed indirect and unnatural method is as follows:
> Titus, you have been found guilty of conducting a lottery: Flavius, you have confessedly violated the constitution. Titus ought to suffer imprisonment for crime, and Flavius for contempt. But no! We shall let you both go free. We shall not punish Flavius directly, but shall do so by reversing Titus' conviction. 8 Evidence § 2184 (3d ed. 1940).

In England, as well as throughout the Commonwealth generally, the illegality of a seizure does not prevent evidence from being admissible in criminal proceedings. Also, police violators of the law are held personally accountable for their transgressions.

In America, however, violations of fourth amendment rights by law enforcement officials always elicit one response from the court—evidence inadmissible under the exclusionary rule. The rule excludes the convicted criminal as well as the offending law enforcement official from answering for his misconduct. Both malefactors are freed to again break the law.

A number of Supreme Court Justices have questioned the usefulness of the exclusionary rule. Mr. Justice Black, in a concurring opinion in Wolf v. Colorado, 388 U.S. 25 (1949), stated:

> The Federal Exclusionary Rule is not a command of the fourth amendment but is a judicially created rule of evidence which Congress might negate.

Again, in Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 648 (1965), Mr. Justice Black said:

> The inference I gather from these repeated statements is that the rule is not a right or privilege accorded to defendants charged with crime but is a sort of punishment against officers in order to keep them from depriving people of their Constitutional rights. In passing I would say that if that is the sole purpose, reason, object and effect of the rule, the court's action in adopting it sounds more like law-making than construing the Constitution.

More recently, Chief Justice Burger stated:

It creates a damage remedy not provided for by the Constitution and not enacted by Congress.

Clearly indicating his view regarding the deleterious effect the exclusionary rule has on justice. In Bivens v. Six Unknown Federal Narcotic Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), Chief Justice Burger recommended this course of action:

Reasonable and effective substitutes can be formulated if Congress would take the lead, as it did for example in 1946 in the Federal Tort Claims Act. I see no insurmountable obstacle to the elimination of the Suppression Doctrine if Congress would provide some meaningful and effective remedy against unlawful conduct by government officials.

It seems then that the Supreme Court has thrown down the gauntlet. Now Congress must answer the challenge.

The rule's adamant demand for a perfect trial is without constitutional foundation. In criminal prosecutions, the sixth amendment maintains that the accused be given a speedy and public trial, not necessarily a perfect trial. In addition, the Supreme Court has repeatedly interpreted the due process clause of the 5th and 14th amendments to require that a "fair trial" be provided, not the aforementioned perfect trial. The concept of a fair trial is an important one. Mr. Justice Rehnquist, in Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433 (1974), stated:

Just as the law does not require that a defendant receive a perfect trial, only a fair one, it cannot realistically require that policemen investigating serious crimes make no errors whatsoever.

The protection of the citizenry is the foremost responsibility of the law enforcement officer; his first priority is to remove nefarious persons such as rapists, murderers, and kidnapers from the streets. In the performance of his duties, the policeman may sometimes err. The exclusionary rule does not distinguish between flagrant violations and accidental errors.

For example, it does not distinguish between clearly unreasonable searches of one's home and simple misstatements of information on a search warrant. Regardless of the magnitude of the error of the policeman, the rule mandates the suppression of evidence obtained in violation of the fourth amendment. The release of a convicted murderer due to an error in a search warrant is necessitated by the exclusionary rule.

S. 1764 should alleviate some of this lack of proportionality. If a police officer is acting in reasonable good faith, then the rule will not operate. Thus, many mistakes of the constable will not "free the guilty," to use the words of the Supreme Court itself.

Under the rule, evidence considered to have been obtained illegally is not permitted into trial, and if causal connection is determined, even the most credible kinds of evidence may be deemed "tainted" and also excluded from the trial. Causal connection refers to the judicial decision that where additional evidence is believed to have been gathered as a result of illegally seized evidence, it shall be subject to the exclusionary rule. For example, the body of a victim is inadmissible evidence at trial if the body was found as a result of a confession of a pickpocket being held illegally by law enforcement officers.

In our society, differing types of criminal elements are present. There are criminals, such as gamblers and pickpockets, who seek monetary gain by committing crimes against property. There are also criminals, such as rapists, and child molesters, who commit violent crimes against the person. The exclusionary rule, however, does not differentiate between heinous crimes against the person, such as rape, child abuse, or homicide, and simple monetary crimes. Its use allows the same reversal for a convicted child molester, on the grounds of the illegality of the search and seizure, as it does a convicted gambler.

Our courts also make a distinction insofar as the penalties meted out to the convicted criminal. The Court demarcates misdemeanors and more serious felony crimes. The penalties established are based on the magnitude of the crime committed. Conviction of a misdemeanor elicits a penalty ranging from a fine or probation to 1 year imprisonment in prison. Conviction of a serious felony crime elicits a penalty ranging from 1 year incarceration in a State or Federal penitentiary to the death penalty. Whereas the courts take into consideration the gravity of the crime, the exclusionary rule does not distinguish the misdemeanor from the more serious felony crime. The rule releases a convicted gambler the same as a convicted killer, totally ignoring the gravity of the crime.

The primary reason for the institution of the exclusionary rule was to deter abusive law enforcement practices. However, there is little substantive proof that the exclusionary rule is an effective deterrent. Mr. Justice White, in his dissenting opinion in Stone against Powell, stated:

As time went on after coming to the bench, I became convinced that Weeks v. United States, (citations omitted), and Mapp v. Ohio had overshot their mark insofar as they aimed to deter lawless action by law enforcement personnel, and that in many of its applications, the exclusionary rule was not advancing that aim in the slightest and that in this respect, it was a senseless obstacle to aiming at the truth in many criminals trials. 428 U.S. 465, 537 (1967).

Mr. Justice White also contends that the rule cannot deter unlawful conduct:

When law enforcement personnel have acted mistakenly, but in good faith and on reasonable grounds, and yet the evidence they have seized is excluded, the exclusion can have no deterrent effect. The officers, if they do their duty, will act in similar fashion in similar circumstances in the future; and the only consequence of the rule as presently administered is that unimpeachable and probative evidence is kept from the trier of fact and the truth-finding function of proceedings is substantially impaired or a trial totally aborted. 428 U.S. 465, at 539.

It has even been suggested that the exclusionary rule promotes illicit conduct by law enforcement officers. Since the rule is conviction-oriented, it is only brought to play at the trial stage of criminal proceedings when law enforcement officials are seeking a conviction, it permits harassment or seizure of contraband by officers who have no intention of a conviction while providing no direct punishment to the officer who may have violated fourth amendment rights. In some instances, the rule diminishes abidance of the law and compels officers to turn to illegal means of law enforcement; that is, false testimony. Where, then, lies the protection for the innocent victim of illegal searches and seizures required by the fourth amendment? Assuming an illegal search and seizure is committed upon a law-abiding citizen, the rule offers him little help, remedy, or protection—certainly no compensation.

Prof. Virgil Peterson's thoughts as to the ineffectiveness of the rule in its protection of the innocent are expressed well:

Rejection of the evidence does nothing to punish the wrongdoing official while it may and likely will, release the wrongdoing defendant. It deprives society of its remedy against one lawbreaker because he has been pursued by another. It protects one against whom incriminating evidence is discovered, but does nothing to protect innocent persons who are the victims of illegal but fruitless searches. (In restrictions of the law of search and seizure, 52 Northwestern Univ. L. Rev. 46 at 55 (1958).

Further proof is found in a report from the American Bar Association's Division of Judicial Administration. A relevant section reads:

Not only has the rule failed to achieve its stated purpose, but it has imposed substantial costs on society in the process. First, the exclusionary rule affords no protection or remedy to innocent persons whose fourth amendment rights have been infringed. Justice Frankfurter noted that the exclusion of evidence is a remedy which directly serves only to protect those upon person or persons something incriminating has been found . . . next it is clear that the exclusionary rule imposes a single, inflexible, and drastic sanction without regard to the nature, circumstances, or degree of police misconduct.

To ascertain the validity of the many criticisms of the exclusionary rule, an empirical study was conducted in Chicago in 1971-72. The study was administered by the U.S. Department of Justice and the University of Chicago Law School. The results indicated the ineffectiveness of the rule as a deterrent to abusive law enforcement practices and illustrated the lopsided protections the rule gives for violations of the fourth amendment rights. Instead of protecting the innocent law-abiding citizen, the rule releases the criminal as well as the offending law enforcement official from answering for his misconduct. In a brief (amicus curiae) submitted by the district attorney of Alameda County in the case of People against Cahan, the district attorney stated:

(The) net result of the exclusionary rule is that the persons who will benefit the most, in fact almost exclusively, are the blackmailer, the kidnapper, the big-time narcotic peddler, the racketeer, the dishonest gambler who preys in devious ways upon a gullible public, the panderer and procurer, the entrepreneur of syndicated prostitution, who like the pimp, lives off the earnings of prostitutes, and other types of organized syndicated crimes 44 Cal. 2d 434 (1955).

In recent Supreme Court decisions concerning the exclusionary rule, Justices have continued to echo the fact, which was first introduced in Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), that the rule is "judicially created and one which Congress might negate."

In S. 1764, Congress is not acting to "negate" the rule as would be permissible. I would prefer such a course as I have said earlier. Nonetheless, the Senate is acting today to rid the criminal justice system of some of the most outrageous effects of the exclusionary rule.

Mr. Edwin Meese describes well the effect of this bill:

Under this rule, if a court finds that the police officer was acting in good faith, based upon his well-founded belief in the state of the law and the situation that confronted him, then the evidence would not be ruled inadmissible and it could be used in the trial of the case. The police officer would still be subject to administrative and other means of discipline if it was found that there was some negligence of some inattention to duty, but particularly where the officer is acting in good faith and where he is even applying the law as it exists at that particular time, the evidence would be available and could be used to determine the gult or innocence of the accused. "Combatting the American Epidemic," Criminal Justice Reform, Regnery Gateway (1983).

This bill will be a step toward restoring confidence in our criminal justice system. I heartily encourage my colleagues to support this measure as a step toward the best option of all—eliminating the ineffective and damaging rule.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, in my judgment, the bill before us ignores the entire meaning of the Bill of Rights. James Madison introduced the first 10 amendments to the Constitution and it was clear that the courts were to be the chief mechanisms of enforcement. Here is what he said, referring to the amendments:

If they are incorporated into the Constitution, independent tribunals of justice will consider them in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights: They will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the legislative or executive; they will be naturally led to resist every encroachment upon rights expressly stipulated for in the Constitution by the declaration of rights.

In my judgment, Mr. President, this bill is now saying that Madison was in fact wrong, that the courts should not be the guardian of our fourth amendment rights, that the courts should not resist encroachments into our privacy rights by law enforcement officers, and that the counts should be a penetrable rather than an impenetrable bulwark when law enforcement officers invade our homes.

Justice Brandeis in his famous dissent in Olmstead against United States said, in 1928:

When the Government, having full knowledge, sought, through the Department of Justice, to avail itself of the fruits of the acts, in order to accomplish its own ends, it assumed moral responsibility for the officers' crimes . . . and if this court should permit the Government, by means of its officers' crimes, to effect its purposes of punishing the defendants . . . the Government itself would become a lawbreaker . . . in a government of laws, existence of the Government will be imperiled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our Government is the patent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the Government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for the law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy.

The noted law professor Yale Kamisar has written that it was only when the exclusionary rule was applied to the States that State law enforcement officers began to pay attention to the requirements of the fourth amendment. Requiring law enforcement officers to be very careful before they take any action which would come close to invading fourth amendment rights is important, and the fact that they are in the great majority of cases, being very careful proves that the exclusionary rule is working.

And if it is, why should we retreat to the past?

In 1979, at Senator KENNEDY's request, the General Accounting Office conducted a study of the impact of the exclusionary rule on Federal prosecutions. The GAO analyzed 2,804 cases across the country processed from July 1 through August 31, a 2-month period, in 1978, in 38 U.S. attorney's offices, and here is what the GAO found: Of cases declined for prosecution by the U.S. attorney, only fourtenths of 1 percent were declined due to fourth amendment search and seizure issues.

Second, only 14.6 percent of the cases actually went through a full trial. An estimated 32.6 percent of the defendants in the cases that went to trial filed fourth amendment motions. So, of the cases that went to trial, less than one-third raised fourth amendment issues, and the issues raised were decided against the defendants in 80 to 90 percent of the cases.

Overall, Mr. President, in only 1.3 percent of the 2,804 defendant cases was evidence excluded as a result of filing a fourth amendment petition. That means that perhaps as little as 1.3 percent of available prosecution time overall was devoted to fourth amendment motions.

Can you imagine how much more complicated the court's job is going to become in deciding how to protect fourth amendment rights if it must discern the intent of law enforcement officers involved in the arrest? Resolution of a question of constitutional law will turn on the state of mind of an officer, rather than on whether evidence has been seized in violation of the constitutional right to be free in our homes from unreasonable searches and seizures.

The current standards of suppression of evidence are capable of being taught to the police and they are objective not subjective. What guidelines is the court to follow in determining whether the arresting officers acted in good faith, and what does the officer's good faith have to do with the fourth amendment anyway?

Proponents argue that the current state of the law undermines public confidence in the law since it appears that the guilty often get off on mere technicalities.

First of all, it is clear to me that the public's confidence will be much more eroded by the passage of this bill than if we do nothing.

Second, we should do more to make sure that the public is aware that in the Federal courts only a very small percentage of defendants are successful in suppressing evidence in criminal cases and having the prosecutions against them dropped.

That is a GAO study, not my study.

Mr. President, the American Bar Association has taken a very strong stand against this. These are all the lawyers in this country. These are the constitutional scholars. These are the zealous guardians of the freedoms that are guaranteed to every citizen, rich or poor, under the Constitution.

Mr. President, I am not going to read all of the American Bar Association's testimony, but I ask unanimous consent that a portion of it, which I have marked, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"GOOD FAITH" EXCEPTION

A third, and perhaps more venturesome, proposal to limit the application of the exclusionary rule may be found in the U.S. Department of Justice recommendation to the Congress that evidence obtained in the course of a reasonable, good faith search should not be excluded from federal criminal trials.

The American Bar Association strenuously opposes these recommendations. Our reasons are several. First, for over 100 years a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States has consistently rejected the so-called "good faith" test. Stacey v. Emery, 97 U.S. 642 (1878); Director General of Railroads v. Kastenbaum, 263 U.S. 25, 28 (1923); Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 162. (1925); Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98, 102 (1959). Objectivity, not subjectivity, is the rule of law.

Also, it is interesting to note that over 20 years ago the Justice Department raised the "good faith" exception. They argued in their brief at p. 68 in the Elkins case that "evidence should not be barred which was obtained by state officers acting in good faith but mistakenly failing to comply with all the legal requirements. Only that evidence would be barred which was obtained by intentional or clear violation of constitutional rights." Counsel for petitioner in his reply brief at p. 18 put it this way:

"We have no doubt that the Court will reject this all too obviously last-ditch alternative. A search is either valid or invalid; there is no middle ground. Close cases will of course arise in the future, as indeed they have in the past; but however difficult it may be to draw the line, a line must somewhere be drawn. An illegal search can no more be saved from condemnation by the apologetic comment that it is only slightly unconstitutional than an egg can be classed as edible simply because it is only slightly rotten." Congress should find the proposal equally difficult to swallow.

Perhaps it was best said by Mr. Justice Stewart in Beck v. Ohio, 379 U.S. 89 (1964) at 97:

"We may assume that the officers acted in good faith in arresting the petitioner. But 'good faith on the part of the arresting officer is not enough.' Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98, 102 . . . if subjective good faith alone was the test, the protections of the Fourth Amendment would evaporate, and the people would be 'secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects,' only in the discretion of the police." [emphasis added].

To say that the proposed "good faith" exception is "a workable rule governing arrests, searches and seizures" is to stand the Fourth Amendment on its head.

Second, in 67 years, federal trial judges have been interpreting a standard of reasonableness predicated on the accumulated wisdom of precedent and experience in every evidentiary hearing in which they have presided pursuant to Rule 12(b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure (or its equivalent prior to 1946). At all times, an objective standard has been the test by which they have scrutinized the admissibility of evidence.

In Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979) at 653-654, Mr. Justice White put it rather simply:

"The essential purpose of the proscriptions in the Fourth Amendment is to impose a standard of reasonableness upon the exercise of discretion by government officials, including law-enforcement agents, in order 'to safeguard the privacy and security of individuals against arbitrary invasions.' (citations omitted) Thus, the permissibility of a particular law-enforcement practice is judged by balancing its instructions on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests against its promotion of legitimate governmental interests. Implemented in this manner, the reasonableness standard usually requires, at a minimum, that the facts upon which an intrusion is based be capable of measurement against 'an objective standard,' whether this be probable cause, or a less stringent test." (footnotes omitted)

In the same term, the Court reiterated its stress on objectively reasonable standards in Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 209 N. 11 (1979). Prouse was decided by 8-1 and Dunaway by 6-2 (with Justice Powell not sitting).

Assuming arguendo that Congress should enact the subjective "good faith" test to supplant the objective standard of reasonableness and the Supreme Court determines it to be constitutional, the effect in Rule 12(b)(3) evidentiary hearing in the 94 United States District Courts would be devastating. Federal law enforcement officers would undoubtedly be permitted to testify not only as to their state of mind regarding "good faith," but probably to give opinion testimony as well. With the burden of proof on the presecution at the lowest rung of the evidentiary ladder—mere preponderance of the evidence to establish the search or seizure was undertaken in a reasonable good faith belief that it was in conformity with the Fourth Amendment—the Sixth Amendment adversary factfinding process in Federal courts become a farce and mockery of justice.

Further, we contend that interpretation by the courts of a new "good faith" exception will engender years of litigation, exaccerbating the problems already facing busy federal trial courts. It also will promote federal law enforcement carelessness, as well as suffer ignorance of the law.

To illustrate our position more fully the rather cogent concluding paragraph in Hoopes, "The Proposed Good Faith Test for Fourth Admendment Exclusion Compared to the § 1983 Good Faith Defense: Problems and Prospects," 20 Ariz. L. Rev. 915, (1979) states at 951:

"If the more salient problems of burdens of proof and workable standards for the determination of when the officer's intent may be judged culpable can be resolved, a properly defined and focused good faith test for exclusion could well provide a rational and effective means of protecting those rights provided for in the fourth amendment. Nevertheless, although the good faith test would appear to make no substantive changes in exclusionary rule analysis, if the Supreme Court draws heavily on the civil history of the good faith standard, the result may be an analysis that focuses disproportionately on the officer's assessment fo the facts. This result seems inconsistent with the overriding policy of the fourth amendment that the determination of the propriety of a search and seizure is ideally removed from the discretion of the officer." (emphasis added)

Only retention of the objective standard of reasonableness can secure Fourth Amendment rights.

Third, we offer a further observation. If the Congress should enact the "good faith" test in the Fourth Amendment context, would not, as Senator Mathias asked in a hearing on October 5, 1981, there be a movement to consider legislation to condone "good faith" violations of First Amendment rights? Taking it two additional steps further, would this lead to proposals to eliminate the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination by supplanting the totality of circumstances test of confessional voluntariness—or the Sixth Amendment prohibition against the use of statements taken from an accused in the absence of counsel? As Mr. Justice Bradley warned almost 100 years ago, in Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886) at 635:

"Constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy, and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of the courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principiis."

So should Congress be as vigilant in the protection of the rights of the individual.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am really pleased that I have heard people say that this bill is not going anywhere in the House of Representatives. It certainly is going to pass here in the Senate. But this is like so many things that we do in the Congress. I voted for the omnibus crime package bill; I voted for the proposal on writs of habeas corpus; I have been a strong champion of preventive detention. But I am not going to support a proposition that I know sounds good on its face that, in my opinion, will erode confidence in law enforcement in this country, not build it.

I talked a great deal the other day on the telephone taping amendment about our right to be secure in our homes and the right to have our privacy secure and not invaded by whim or caprice.

I invite any Member of this body to tell me what does it mean when you go from an objective determination to a question of good faith, the Court will be required to say, "You seized evidence and you did not have any right to bust into somebody's home, but did you have good faith when you did so?" The objective determination—was the search legal or not—has been precedent in this country for years and years, and is the thing that sets this country apart from the Soviet Union and every other totalitarian government in the world. And you tell me that we are taking a wise course by moving from an objective evaluation to a subjective evaluation called good faith, where the courts have to tell you what was in an arresting officer's mind at the time he did whatever he did.

Who knows that? I invite anybody in this Chamber to tell me what is the test for determining good faith. You do not have to worry about it under existing law. You do not have to worry about what was on the officer's mind under present law. You do not have to worry about whether he is operating in good faith or bad faith. You do not have to worry about whether a judge is smart enough to know what was in a law enforcement officer's mind at the time he busted your door down for good or bad.

But if you pass this bill, you have to worry about all of that.

It is another case of the medicine being worse than the disease.

Mr. President, I have never understood why the Justice Department continues to insist on such a gross violation of the fourth amendment rights in the Constitution. And I might say I cannot understand why this body continually wants to tinker with the Constitution of the United States. I am just grateful that the people of this country in their infinite wisdom have only seen fit to tinker with that document 26 times in over 200 years. And yet, we hardly do anything else around here anymore, except propose changing constitutional guarantees.

So, Mr. President, I hope that a lot of people in this body share my view that the crime rate of this country is a national disgrace.

I hope many Senators share my view that we have been hacking away at the branches instead of the roots of the causes of crime in this country. But I am just thankful for the House of Representatives if they have, in fact, taken the position that they do not intend to entertain this bill. The American people owe them a debt of gratitude if that is, in fact, the case, because I guarantee you would not any more than get this passed until a lot of people in this country would be awfully sorry. So I am pleading with my colleagues to stand up for the Constitution of the United States, our right of privacy, our right to be free in our homes, without worrying about government intrusion. I have never understood why this administration wants government on your back and onto your telephone lines and into your bedroom and busting in your doors and all the rest of it.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. HATCH. Equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none and it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, in part:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated.

That constitutional language is a clear directive. It says that that right shall not be violated. And our courts have, for 70 years, applied that directive as clearly as the Constitution requires to all Federal criminal cases.

In 1961, in Mapp against Ohio, the Supreme Court extended that directive to the proceedings of State courts as well, in a decision which clearly and unambiguously reinforces its fourth amendment basis:

> We hold that all evidence obtained by searches and seizures in violation of the Constitution is, by that same authority, inadmissible in a State court.

The Court has required that when an officer of the Government breaks the law in a criminal case, the Government may not use the fruits of that act to prosecute that case.

In the two decades that have followed the Mapp decision, the Court has never retracted its finding of the constititional basis on which that decision and subsequent related decisions are founded. The Court has defined and refined the results of that finding, but the fundamental constitutional basis for it remains.

The bill before us, S. 1764, seeks by a majority vote to alter that long-standing judicial interpretation of the fourth amendment. And it seeks to do so, ironically, at a time when the Supreme Court itself may very soon resolve the particular problems that the bill attempts to address.

The bill's purpose is to provide that evidence obtained by law enforcement officials in good faith may not be excluded from criminal proceedings, even though the evidence was illegally obtained.

The fourth amendment's prohibition against illegal searches and seizures is one of the clearest and most direct constitutional commands. It grew out of the experience of the actual events that preceded the Revolutionary War. It was not an abstract legalistic theory imposed on the new nation to redress some future grievance, but a very direct and very practical response to the experiences of the framers themselves.

In a document whose purpose is to define the limits of Government's power, the framers included language which asserts a positive right on the part of the people to be free of Government illegality in their persons, their homes, their papers and their effects.

This language is clear. But it is not self-enforcing. The responsibility of the courts is clear. They must enforce it.

In numerous cases, stretching over many decades of deliberation, the Supreme Court has held that the exclusion of illegally obtained evidence is required to enforce the fourth amendment. The Court has observed that unless such a discipline is enforced, the effect would be to permit that fourth amendment right "to remain an empty promise." (Mapp)

The exclusionary rule has been developed and circumscribed by the Supreme Court to protect that fundamental right without, at the same time, allowing its blatant misuse to pervert the truth-seeking function of criminal proceedings.

The Court has ruled that evidence which was illegally obtained may not be barred from impeachment proceedings. It has denied the use of the exclusionary rule by other parties to a case, by ruling that only the individual whose fourth amendment rights were directly violated may avail himself of those rights. The Court permits the use of illegally obtained evidence in other proceedings than those in which the fundamental question of innocence or guilt is to be decided: In grand jury proceedings, in civil cases, and in the relitigation of search and seizure issues in habeas proceedings. The Court has also prohibited the use of the exclusionary rule retroactively.

Contrary to the impression that some have tried to convey, there is not now an unlimited right for defendants to bar incriminating evidence and thus escape fair trial.

The limits the Court has already placed on the exclusionary rule are designed to reach and maintain a balance between the Government's needs in criminal cases and the fourth amendment's clear directive that the right of the people be to be secure is a constitutionally protected right.

As such, it is open to question whether the Congress has the power to unilaterally weaken or undermine the extent of that right.

The Court has clearly said that barring illegally obtained evidence is a "constitutionally required—even if judicially imposed—deterrent safeguard without * * * which the fourth amendment would have been reduced to a 'form of words.'" (Mapp) That finding is clear and straightforward. It does not, in my judgment, give the Congress the type of leeway that this bill would take, to change the nature of the deterrent safeguard by altering the standards against which it must be judged. The Supreme Court has found that the safeguard is to be judged against the fourth amendment—not against the desirable social goal of reducing court workloads, or preserving the morale of police officers, or any other social purpose.

The Congress cannot simply arrogate to itself the right to make adjustments in the degree and type of constitutional protections which the Court has ruled exist. To do that, we must take the route of amending the Constitution to limit those protections directly. There is no other constitutional ground on which elected representatives in this or any future Congress may simply overturn or change or modify the constitutional findings of our Supreme Court.

In the past seveal years, we have seen and rejected a number of attempts to legislate that which cannot be legislated. This appears on the face of it to be another such case. In earlier attempts, we have faced efforts to strip the Supreme Court of its right to rule in specific areas. In this instance, we will be attempting to dictate to the Court the limits it may find to a constitutionally required protection.

The protections and requirements of the Constitution are not, as some would imply, designed to benefit criminals and misfits. They are the essential safeguards of the liberties of all Americans. It is a popular misconception that we can somehow cheaply win the war against violent crime if we are simply willing to modify, or abridge or alter constitutional protections, particularly if we mislabel them. To those seeking a quick and easy answer, constitutional requirements tend to be described as "legal technicalities." But the legal technicality before us today is grounded in one of the most fundamental American rights: the right to maintain the privacy of our homes against dragnet searches for criminals.

Violent crimes terrorize communities and under the influence of that terror, public opinion is willing to countenance virtually any abridgement of constitutional rights. At the height of the Zebra killings in San Francisco in 1974, the police issued a directive to stop and pat down every black male in the city who was between 20 and 30 years old, and taller than 5'8". At the height of a crime wave, most citizens are willing to say that anyone who has the unfortunate luck to fit this kind of description should submit for the greater good of the community.

But would most citizens, upon calmer reflection, agree that police ought to have the right to stop and search virtually anyone who meets a description as to height, race and sex? I doubt it.

But if we tamper with the carefully developed rules which the Supreme Court has developed to preserve the fourth amendment protections, where shall we draw the line when some other infringement of constitutional rights seems to serve an immediate and compelling purpose?

Neither the fourth amendment nor the other commandments of the Constitution can be disregarded when they impose an inconvenient or troublesome duty on the Government. Indeed, the chief purpose of the Constitution itself if to impose on Government the duty to act only under the laws. Justice Brandeis, in a deservedly famous dissent, made the case for a government under law which we would do well to recall:

> In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperilled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our government is the patent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the Government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy.
> To declare that in the administration of the criminal law, the end justifies the means—to declare that the government may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal—would bring terrible retribution.
> The makers of our Constitution . . . sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions, and their sensations. They conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men. To protect that right, every unjustifiable intrusion by the Government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation of the Fourth Amendment." (Dissenting, Olmstead v. U.S. 1928).

Ironically, the bill before us not only seeks to weaken the constitutionally defined fourth amendment protections, but seeks to do so at a time when a few months' wait is very likely to dispel whatever uncertainty exists about the extent to which good faith actions by law enforcement officers are a protection against the barring of illegal evidence.

The Supreme Court has asked for and heard oral argument in two cases which it will decide this session: Massachusetts against Sheppard and U.S. against Leon.

In the Leon case, the Solicitor General has said that the issues at stake are precisely the same as those in a case the Court declined to review on constitutional grounds last year. In accepting this petition, the Court has sent an unambigious signal that it will, now, decide those constitutional issues. And the issue raised by Leon could not bear more directly on the purposes of this bill:

> Whether the fourth amendment exclusionary rule should be modified so as not to bar the admission of evidence seized in reasonable, good-faith reliance upon a search warrant that is subsequently held to be defective.

The other case, Massachusetts against Sheppard presents the question: "Whether the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts erred in refusing to recognize a good faith exception to the exclusionary rule"?

The subject of both these cases goes directly to the heart of S. 1764, the bill before us. That bill would provide, first, a reasonable, good faith exception to the exclusionary rule, and second, it would provide a prima facie exception where a warrent has been obtained.

This Senate need not take the constitutionally questionable route of modifying a fourth amendment protection at a time when the Supreme Court itself will shortly issue rulings that could well resolve the issues in this bill. There is absolutely no practical need for the haste with which we are asked to approve this measure.

Nor is there sufficient legislative background on which to proceed. The only hearings the Senate has ever held on the issue of the application and reach of the exclusionary rule were not held in this Congress. They took place in 1981 and 1982, before the Subcommittee on Criminal Law. The subcommittee did not, at that time, recommend a legislative change.

In fact, the former chairman of the subcommittee, under whose guidance the hearings were held, has informed the Senate that the majority of witnesses who believe the rule can and ought be changed did not support the idea of a good faith exception.

U.S. Circuit Court Judge Wilkey, who has strongly and effectively stated the problems that grow out of the practical application of the exclusionary rule has also said that outright abolition—if that were possible—would be preferable to a good-faith exception, which is what we find in the bill before us. He has characterized the compromise of providing a good-faith exception as a compromise which is the kind of compromise which may be as disastrous as trying to make the Grand Canyon in two jumps.

That witness and other witnesses at the hearings in 1981 and 1982 held that the purpose of the exclusionary rule—the deterrence of illegal conduct by officers of the Government—can and should be sought in a way that separates Government misconduct from the criminal guilt of the accused. The former subcommittee chairman informs us that the majority of witnesses did, in fact, recommend such an alternative process. Yet the measure before us now takes no cognizance whatever of the testimony that the Senate sought and received. Instead, it simply takes the step of modifying the rule without providing any alternative remedy of any kind.

An alternative remedy which the Congress could provide is an approach that has many distinguished supporters: Justice Potter Stewart, writing in the Columbia Law Review just last year made the case clearly:

> The Constitution and the rule of law require that the fourth amendment not be reduced to a mere form of words, virtually stricken from the Constitution. In my view, however, that fact does not necessarily require that one particular remedy—exclusion—be adopted. Instead, the Constitution requires only that there be some effective remedy to ensure that agents of the government obey the Fourth Amendment. Thus exclusion is constitutionally required only if, without it, there would be no adequate means to ensure that the government obeys the fourth amendment.

This not only clearly reiterates that the Constitution demands a remedy to fourth amendment violations, but provides a point of departure for legislative action which the committee majority has ignored in the bill now before us. Instead, we face a legislative proposal which in fact risks the effect of minimizing the deterrent function of the rule. As Justice Stewart has written:

> Adoption of a good faith exception . . . may cause police officers to shift the focus of their inquiry from what does the Fourth Amendment require in this situation? to what will the courts allow me to get away with?

It is ironic that the opponents of the exclusionary rule are asking the Senate to enshrine it in law. For if the good faith exception is enacted, we will have a bad faith exclusionary rule as a matter of statute, regardless whether the courts ultimately find some alternative and more effective means of enforcing the fourth amendment's requirements.

In short, not only is this legislative proposal poorly timed, given the cases now before the Supreme Court, but it would have the effect of giving a statutory authority to the exclusionary rule which it has never previously enjoyed. That was the second jump over the Grand Canyon that Judge Wilkey identified in his testimony before the Subcommittee on Criminal Law.

We would be well advised to await the outcome of the Supreme Court's rulings on the two pending cases. We would be well advised to develop, in the normal legislative course, the basis for constitutionally sound legislation that may reach to the kind of alternative remedies Justice Potter Stewart has described.

What is clear, however, is that there is neither wisdom, nor legislative restraint, nor constitutionality in approving this measure now.

Thank you, Mr. President.

I yield the floor.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have just talked to the Vice President of the United States, and I am advised that the President will make an address to the Nation at approximately 5:55 p.m. this evening on the situation in Lebanon.

I make this announcement at this time so Senators may be aware of it and may be in a position to watch and hear the President's remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield time from the time allotted to me to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I have long been one of the leading supporters of strong, effective anticrime legislation. I was proud to work with the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND; the ranking minority member, Senator BIDEN; and the chairman of the Criminal Law Subcommittee, Senator LAXALT, to forge a bipartisan package of anticrime reforms which can make a real difference in our continuing war against crime. The overhaul of our criminal sentencing system and bail reforms contained in the bipartisan package are essential changes which are long overdue. Other law enforcement improvements in the package in the areas of drug trafficking, criminal forfeiture, and prosecution of violent juveniles are critical tools for the reduction of crime in America. The bipartisan crime package also contained much needed Federal assistance for State and local prosecutors who are our front line against crime.

The Senate did some excellent work on crime last week. It adopted the bipartisan crime package which I have just described by an overwhelming majority of 91 to 1. The coalition of Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives, which supported the crime package demonstrates that we can adopt significant anticrime legislation, without jeopardizing the constitutional rights or the civil liberties of any citizen.

But I am as strongly opposed to the legislation which the Senate considers today as I was supportive of the legislation which the Senate approved last week. I worked vigorously to separate the exclusionary rule, habeas corpus, and capital punishment legislation from the bipartisan anticrime package, because these measures are not anticrime and because they may well infringe on constitutional rights and important civil liberties.

In particular, relaxing the exclusionary rule is not a practical step to take in the war against crime. A study by the General Accounting Office released in 1979 revealed that in only 1.3 percent of the 2,084 criminal prosecutions examined was evidence excluded as the result of a fourth amendment violation. In less than one-half of 1 percent of the cases analyzed was an exclusionary rule problem the primary reason for a prosecutorial decision not to bring a case. Simply put, the so-called reform in this legislation will not make any significant difference in reducing crime.

In addition, this is not an area where congressional action is warranted at this time. Two cases which raise the same issue and seek the same change in the exclusionary rule proposed in this legislation are now pending in the Supreme Court. In Massachusetts against Sheppard and U.S. against Leon, which have already been argued and are now awaiting decision, the Government has asked the court to read a good-faith exception into the exclusionary rule. If the Government wins, then there is no need for this legislation; if the Government loses, then this legislation is unconstitutional. Either way, the bill does not deserve to pass.

If the Senate is serious about reducing crime, we should be urging the House of Representatives to enact the criminal law reforms which the Senate passed last week. I intend to vote against this bill. It is an empty gesture and I hope the Senate will not adopt it.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need off of the time of the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I want to associate myself with the very erudite presentation which the Senator from Maine made in connection with this issue.

I rise to indicate my opposition to the passage of this legislation. We all know the Supreme Court will soon decide this issue. There is not any reason why we should not wait to see what their decision is and what guidelines, if any, they lay down.

The fact is that there is something totally wrong about abolishing the exclusionary rule if the police officer is acting in good faith. How do you prove good faith and what are the standards? What this means is that police can violate the Constitution and not have any reservations whatsoever about doing it.

Now the fourth amendment to the Constitution is very clear. It provides:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

But somehow this administration has moved in the last 3 years, under the leadership of the President and the Attorney General, to the point where they do not care about the Constitution any more. They want to just cry out that they are doing something about the crime in this country.

Well, let me tell you that they are probably doing more to add to the crime of this country than any administration in this Nation's history. When you make more people hungry, when you keep people from having a place to sleep, when you do not give young people a chance to get an education, you add to the forces that create crime in this Nation.

You do not eliminate crime by eliminating the exclusionary rule. This is just one of the specious arguments that we hear so often around here that somehow this is going to do much to eliminate crime.

How many cases do you think the exclusionary rule was used in? According to a GAO study of 2,804 cases, in only 1.3 percent of those cases had the evidence been excluded by reason of the exclusionary rule.

This bill does not make sense. Sure, you can go home and tell your constituents that you passed a bill to stop crime. Talk about how we are going to have a new drug task force to stop crime. But that is not enough. We are going to pass a bill to weaken the exclusionary rule so that evidence can be used in court if it was obtained improperly. Let the police officer use almost any method to obtain the evidence and then come in and indicate that he was really doing it in good faith and that is OK, police can use an improper warrant and obtain the evidence, as is the case in the case pending in the Supreme Court, and then claim, "Well, good faith is a good defense."

Maybe the Supreme Court will come out and say something about that. But until they do I do not think this Senate ought to be passing legislation.

Now the facts are that in this Nation's history we always prided ourselves on the right to privacy. We always thought that people could not listen in our telephone conversations because there was a right to privacy. We thought that police officers could not bang into our homes or obtain evidence from us using illegal methods without a warrant because there was a right to privacy.

Well, George Orwell talked about it. He said that 1984 would be the year when there would be some omnipresent kind of taping, so that they would know what you were thinking, know what you were doing and they would be able to control your life.

Well, this bill is S. 1764, but it probably ought to be numbered S. 1984, because this bill is one step—and a major one at that—in the direction of George Orwell's "1984."

You know, we have been standing around the floor of the Senate now for a couple of weeks debating crime issues. I voted for the omnibus bill. There are a half-dozen other bills that are coming up too. Are we really accomplishing anything? Are we really doing something about which we can be so proud that we can go back and tell our constituents about it?

I have read that the House has already said the bill has those letters on it that I hear about on television when the body comes in—DOA, dead on arrival. They say the omnibus bill is dead on arrival.

I do not know what will happen with the exclusionary bill that is before us now, S. 1764; a/k/a, 1984. But the fact is that this bill is not going to do anything to solve the problem of crime in this country. The fact is that this bill is going to invade the constitutional rights of people. And the fact is that, after years of litigation, if it does become law, it undoubtedly will be declared unconstitutional.

So, later this afternoon we will probably vote on this bill, or maybe tomorrow morning, and when we do, a lot of people will think they have done something to put a roadblock in the way of crime in this country, or in helping to send our criminals or alleged criminals to prison.

But I submit we will not have achieved our objective; instead we will have violated the constitutional right of millions of Americans because once you begin to break down this right of privacy, there is no limit to how far you will go.

I think this legislation is ill begotten. I think it is ill advised. I think the Senate would be well advised to defeat it. I do not kid myself. It will probably pass overwhelmingly. But I hope that wiser judgments will be reached in the House and that the House will see fit to defeat S. 1764.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would like to offer just a few remarks in response to the views of the distinguished gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) on the subject of S. 1764. I do so because these views are generally representative of those of opponents of this measure.

CONSTITUTIONALITY

As I understand them, the Senator from Maryland is opposed to S. 1764 for two reasons. First, he questions the constitutional authority of Congress to legislate an exception to the exclusionary rule, and suggests that the fourth admendment to the Constitution mandates such a rule.

I would strongly take issue with this assertion. The fourth amendment to the Constitution states simply that—

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated.

There is no further direction in the amendment given as to the procedures for enforcing its provisions, or the sanctions to be applied for violating its provisions. Nothing in the text of the amendment explicitly or implicitly provides for the exclusion of criminal proceedings of evidence seized in violation of the fourth amendment.

Rather, the exclusionary rule is a judicially created sanction—one of a number which could have been created—designed to deter police misconduct in violation of the fourth amendment. It has been justified by the courts, not as a necessary outgrowth of the provisions of the fourth amendment but as a deterrent to police misconduct. To the extent that alternative deterrents existed, or to the extent that the exclusionary rule did not serve a deterrent value, there is nothing in the opinions of the Supreme Court to suggest that the exclusionary rule was of constitutional magnitude.

Indeed, this can be evidenced by the increasing incidence of cases in which the Court has refused to apply the rule or admitted exceptions to the rule. To the extent that the exclusionary rule has not been able to serve as a deterrent measure, the Court has not been reluctant to exclude its application. Had the exclusionary rule been a constitutional requirement, the judiciary could not have limited the scope of its inquiry in this manner.

In Alderman against United States, for example, the Court refused to allow the rule to be raised by a person whose own fourth amendment rights had not been violated. (394 U.S. 165 (1969).) In reaching this conclusion, the Court stated:

> What petitioners appear to assert is an independent constitutional right of their own to exclude relevant and probative evidence because it was seized from another in violation of the Fourth Amendment . . . We are not convinced that the additional benefits of extending the exclusionary rule to other defendants would justify further encroachment upon the public interest in prosecuting those accused of crime and having them acquitted or convicted on the basis of all the evidence which exposes the truth.

Thus, the Court in Alderman was not at all hesitant in limiting the breadth of the exclusionary rule on the basis of the perceived costs and benefits of applying the rule in a particular circumstance.

Similarly, in United States against Ceccolini the Court refused to apply the rule to a situation in which evidence was obtained as a highly indirect result of an illegal search and seizure. 435 U.S. 266. In reaching this result, the Court stated:

> The cost of permanently silencing [a witness] * * is too great for an evenhanded system of law enforcement to bear in order to secure such a speculative and very likely negligible deterrent effect.

Again, the Court engaged in what amounted to a balancing test in which the marginal deterrent impact of applying this extraordinary rule was weighed against the overall cost to the law enforcement and judicial processes.

In employing such a balancing test, the Court has, on various occasions since Mapp, refused to apply the exclusionary rule in grand jury proceedings, in civil proceedings, and in habeas corpus proceedings. Further, it has refused to apply the rule on a retroactive basis where the absence of any deterrent value is self-evident.

Had the exclusionary rule been one of constitutional dimension, its lack of application could never have been justified on such pragmatic grounds by the Court. Instead, because it is simply a judicially proposed remedy, and subject to amendment on the basis of empirical analysis, the rule has been limited and modified where prudent public policy required. S. 1764 is entirely consistent with this understanding of the rule.

GOOD FAITH

The Senator from Maryland next objects to S. 1764 on the grounds that the good-faith rule established in this bill does not represent an effective response to perceived abuses of the exclusionary rule. While I am not unsympathetic to alternative approaches to dealing with this problem—including outright abolition of the rule—I would strongly disagree that S. 1764 does not represent a sound response to the failure of present policy. It may not be the perfect legislative measure but it does represent a significant step toward restoring the integrity of our criminal justice system and refocusing the criminal trial upon the search for truth rather than the search for procedural perfection.

What the good-faith exception will do, first of all, is to require reviewing courts to determine whether or not police misconduct occurred at all. To the extent that a law enforcement officer carried out his or her responsibilities in good faith, it is difficult to imagine the value of a rule which subsequently results in the exclusion of evidence obtained through such a process. Clearly, there can be no deterrent value to a rule which excludes evidence seized by an officer who conducted himself in a manner that he believed to be consistent with the Constitution of the United States. If there is no deterrent value to the application of the rule, then there is no other justification for the rule that would require its application in these circumstances.

In addition to expressly limiting the scope of the exclusionary rule to those instances in which it has a deterrent effect, the good-faith exception highlights the fact that increasingly the rule has been utilized to exclude from consideration by the factfinder evidence seized, not as a result of police misconduct, but as a result of often technical violations of highly complex and ambiguous rules of fourth amendment procedure. To allow such evidence to be barred from the courtroom is a perfect example of elevating form over substance and subordinating the search for guilt or innocence to essentially irrelevant questions of procedural formality.

While I am not necessarily in disagreement with the Senator from Maryland that the courts will be required, in applying the good-faith exception, to make often difficult determinations, I hardly find that persuasive in recommending the status quo. I would doubt that the Senator would be more enthusiastic about a bill which abolished the rule entirely despite the fact that this would eliminate any threshhold questions of good-faith conduct entirely. In summary, Mr. President, S. 1764, as with most of what this body does, represents a good-faith effort to address a serious public policy problem in a way that can achieve a consensus among Members. It is not a perfect solution from my perspective any more than it is from that of the Senator from Maryland, but it does represent a significant improvement over present law.

Mr. President, S. 1764 is one of the most important criminal law reform measures that this body is likely to consider for many Congresses. Perhaps even more clearly than the other measures that have recently been debated in the Senate, the exclusionary rule illustrates much of what is wrong within our present system of criminal justice. Instead of a system of criminal law in which the search for truth, the search for guilt or innocence, is the principle guiding objective, we have seen our system increasingly degraded into one in which procedures and details and form are elevated above all else. In the process, we have created a system of criminal justice that is widely scorned by the American people, widely viewed as arbitrary, and widely viewed as a system incapable of protecting the domestic tranquility of our cities and urban areas. S. 1764 represents an important step in reversing this trend. I strongly urge its adoption by my colleagues.

Mr. President, I just want to say in closing that this is a very important piece of legislation. I would remind the Senate that the administration strongly supports this bill; that the Justice Department strongly supports this bill; the National Association of Attorneys General strongly supports this bill; and the National District Attorneys Association strongly supports this bill.

Mr. President, just in a few words, I want to say that the effect of this bill would provide that evidence obtained in a reasonable, good-faith search should not be excluded from Federal criminal trials. The bill is intended to enhance the operation of the Federal criminal justice system by allowing courts better access to all reliable evidence relevant in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, thereby promoting renewed respect for our system of justice.

Mr. President, again I hope that the Senate will pass this bill overwhelmingly.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, is there time remaining under the order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is time remaining.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Chair advise me as to how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has 36 minutes, the Senator from Maryland has 55 minutes, the Senator from Delaware has 32 minutes, the Senator from Arkansas has 44 minutes, and the Senator from Maine has 22 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am sure they are ready to yield back their remaining time, but while we double-check, is there time remaining on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time on the bill is allocated among the five Senators.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum to be charged against the time of the distinguished manager of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield back my remaining time and all other time in opposition to the legislation.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield back my remaining time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to yield back the remainder of the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. We yield back that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ARMSTRONG), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. HECHT), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), and the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), and the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) would each vote "yea."

Mr. BYRD. I announce that the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY) is absent because of illness in family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 63, nays 24, as follows:

So the bill (S. 1764) was passed, as follows:

S. 1764

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Exclusionary Rule Limitation Act of 1983".

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3505. Limitation of the fourth amendment exclusionary rule

"Except as specifically provided by statute, evidence which is obtained as a result of a search or seizure and which is otherwise admissible shall not be excluded in a proceeding in a court of the United States if the search or seizure was undertaken in a reasonable, good faith belief that it was in conformity with the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. A showing that evidence was obtained pursuant to and within the scope of a warrant constitutes prima facie evidence of such a reasonable good faith belief, unless the warrant was obtained through intentional and material misrepresentation.".

(b) The table of sections of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following item:

"3505. Limitation of the fourth amendment exclusionary rule.".

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I wish to make two or three announcements.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Chair maintain order so that we can hear?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, next, it is the intention of the leadership on this side to try to reach the so-called drug czar bill. There is a budget waiver to accompany that bill. The chairman of the committee has authorized me to say on his behalf—and the manager of the bill is here—that he does not oppose the bill and is agreeable to its passage by voice vote. Of course, any Senator can ask for the yeas and nays if he or she wishes, but it would be my hope that we can pass that bill with minimum debate, in the shortest time possible.

After that, it is the intention of the leadership on this side to try to reach the death penalty bill. I hope it is possible to do that. I do not anticipate that we will be in late tonight in that event, but I do hope that we can lay down the bill and have it pending before we go out this evening.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

On another matter——

Mr. BYRD. Will the majority leader proceed to lay down the drug czar bill? I think it has been cleared on this side.

BUDGET WAIVER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 645, Senate Resolution 324, a budget waiver to accompany the drug czar bill.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 324) waiving Section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 1787.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 324

Resolved, That pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are wavied with respect to consideration of S. 1787. Such waiver is necessary because S. 1787, as reported, authorizes the enactment of new budget authority which would first become available in fiscal year 1984, and such bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1983, as required by section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for such authorizations.

The budget waiver will allow Senate consideration for S. 1787, entitled the "National Narcotics Act of 1983". The bill establishes the Office of the Director of National and International Drug Operations and Policy".

S. 1787 authorizes the appropriation of $500,000 for fiscal year 1984, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the four succeeding fiscal years.

NATIONAL NARCOTICS ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 359, S. 1787, to establish an office of the Director of National and International Drug Operations and Policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1787) to establish an office of the Director of National and International Drug Operations and Policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

LEBANON

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, about 45 minutes ago I talked to the Vice President of the United States on the telephone, and he indicated at that time that the President was prepared to make a speech on national television, from California, about the situation in Lebanon. As most Members know now, that television address did not occur. I cannot tell the Senate why it did not. Perhaps there were technical reasons.

In any event, Senators should be aware of the fact that a written statement by the President on the Lebanon situation was released by the White House about 15 minutes ago. I will attempt to have copies of that statement available for Senators as soon as possible.

(Later the following occurred:)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, President Reagan has just announced a phased and measured redeployment of the marine contingent of the Multinational Forces in Lebanon from their location adjacent to the airport to the ships offshore. I commend the President for this prudent and timely action given the difficulty of the circumstances we find now in Beirut.

I continue to hope that President Gemayel can weather this crisis and provide Lebanon a government, free of foreign interference, which will allow the Lebanese to recapture control of their own destiny.

NATIONAL NARCOTICS ACT

The Senate continued with the consideration of S. 1787.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope we can proceed expeditiously with the consideration of this matter.

Before that, I inquire of the managers on both sides if they or anyone else anticipate a rollcall vote on this measure.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I stand here as one who is filling in for the chairman, Senator THURMOND, and the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator HATCH. It is my understanding that Senator BIDEN will be the floor manager on the other side.

I have an amendment which I will present on behalf of the committee chairman which I understand has been agreed to. There will not be a rollcall vote requested by the majority, and I cannot speak for the minority Members, Senator BIDEN is not present.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. It is my understanding that the Senator from Delaware does not think a rollcall vote is necessary. I do not know if other Members will request it. Senator BIDEN indicated to me earlier that he did not feel it was necessary.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it appears that there will not be a rollcall vote. I caution Senators that the leadership cannot guarantee that there will not be, since any Senator can ask for it. It does not appear likely.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Do we have an estimate of the time for this piece of legislation?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished manager of the bill on this side to give us an estimate of how long it will take.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the manager was sitting in his office 20 minutes ago when he was advised of his role in this particular effort. Therefore, I really cannot add much of a dimension to that question. A half hour, equally divided.

Mr. FORD. Under those circumstances, it appears to be very short.

Mr. BAKER. I hope it will not take even a half hour. Rather than try to clear a unanimous-consent agreement, which might take longer than a half hour, I will just sit down and hope things go well.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, since the bill has been laid before the Senate, I submit to the body an amendment, which has been concurred in by the managers of the bill, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON), for Mr. THURMOND, proposes an amendment numbered 2700.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, strike out line 3 and all that follows through line 20 on page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following: That this Act may be cited as the "National Narcotics Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby makes the following findings:

(1) The flow of illegal narcotics into the United States is a major and growing problem.

(2) The problem of illegal drug activity falls across the entire spectrum of Federal activities both nationally and internationally.

(3) Illegal drug trafficking is estimated by the General Accounting Office to be an $80,000,000,000 per annum industry in the United States.

(4) The annual consumption of drugs has reached epidemic proportions.

(5) Despite the efforts of the United States Government and other nations, the mechanisms for smuggling opium and other hard drugs into the United States remain virtually intact and United States agencies estimate that they are able to interdict no more than 5 to 15 percent of all hard drugs flowing into the country.

(6) Such significant indicators of the drug problem as drug-related deaths, emergency room visits, hospital admissions due to drug-related incidents, and addiction rates are soaring.

(7) Increased drug trafficking is strongly linked to violent, addiction-related crime and recent studies have shown that over 90 percent of heroin users rely upon criminal activity as a means of income.

(8) Much of the drug trafficking is handled by syndicates, a situation which results in increased violence and criminal activity because of the competitive struggle for control of the domestic drug market.

(9) Controlling the supply of illicit drugs is a key to reducing the crime epidemic confronting every region of the country.

(10) The magnitude and scope of the problem requires the establishment of a National Drug Enforcement Policy Board, chaired by the Attorney General, to facilitate coordination of all Federal efforts by relevant agencies.

(11) Such a board must have responsibility for coordinating the operations of Federal agencies involved in attacking this problem through the development of policy and resources, so that a unified and efficient effort can be undertaken.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to insure—

(1) the maintenance of a national and international effort against illegal drugs;

(2) that the activities of the Federal agencies involved are fully coordinated; and

(3) that a single, competent, and responsible high-level Board of the United States Government, chaired by the Attorney General, will be charged with this responsibility of coordinating United States policy with respect to national and international drug law enforcement.

SEC. 3. There is established in the executive branch of the Government a Board to be known as the "National Drug Enforcement Policy Board" (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Board"). There shall be at the head of the Board a Chairman who shall be the Attorney General (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Chairman"). In addition to the Chairman, the Board shall be comprised of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Defense, Transportation, Health and Human Services, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget and the Director of Central Intelligence and such other officials as may be appointed by the President. Decisions made by the Board pursuant to section 4(a) of this Act shall be acknowledged by each member thereof in writing.

SEC. 4. (b) For the purpose of coordinating the activities of the several departments and agencies with responsibility for drug law enforcement and implementing the determinations of the Board, it shall be the duty of the Chairman—

(1) to advise the Board in matters concerning drug law enforcement;

(2) to make recommendations to the Board for the coordination of drug enforcement activities;

(3) to correlate and evaluate intelligence and other information on drug law enforcement to support the activities of the Board;

(4) to act as primary adviser to the President and Congress on national and international illegal drug law enforcement programs and policies developed by the Board under subsection (a) of this section and the implementation thereof; and

(5) to perform such other duties as the President may direct.

(a) The Board shall facilitate coordination of United States operations and policy on illegal drug law enforcement. In the furtherance of that responsibility, the Board shall have the responsibility, and is authorized to—

(1) review, evaluate and develop United States Government policy, strategy and resources with respect to illegal drug law enforcement efforts, including budgetary priorities and a National and International Drug Law Enforcement Strategy;

(2) facilitate coordination of all United States Government efforts to halt national and international trafficking in illegal drugs; and

(3) coordinate the collection and evaluation of information necessary to implement United States policy with respect to illegal drug law enforcement.

(c) In carrying out responsibilities under this section, the Chairman, on behalf of the Board is authorized to—

(1) direct, with the concurrence of the head of the agency employing such personnel, the assignment of government personnel within the United States Government in order to implement United States policy with respect to illegal drug law enforcement;

(2) provide guidance in the implementation and maintenance of policy, strategy and resources developed under subsection (a) of this section;

(3) review and approve the reprogramming of funds relating to budgetary priorities developed under subsection (a) of this section;

(4) procure temporary and intermittent services under section 3109(b) of title 5 of the United States Code, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the maximum annual rate of basic pay payable for the grade of GS-18 of the General Schedule;

(5) accept and use donations of property from all government agencies; and

(6) use the mails in the same manner as any other department or agency of the executive branch.

(d) Notwithstanding the authority granted in subsection (a) of this section, the Board shall not interfere with routine law enforcement or intelligence decisions of any agency.

(e) The Administrator of the General Services Administration shall provide to the Board on a reimbursable basis such administrative support services as the Chairman may request.

SEC. 5. The Chairman shall submit to the Congress, within nine months after enactment of this Act, and biannually thereafter, a full and complete report reflecting United States policy with respect to illegal drug law enforcement, plans proposed for the implementation of such policy, and, commencing with the submission of the second report, a full and complete report reflecting accomplishments with repect to the United States policy and plans theretofore submitted to the Congress.

SEC. 6. Title II of the Drug Abuse Prevention, Treatment and Rehabilitation Act (21 U.S.C. 1112) is amended by adding at the end of section 201 (21 U.S.C. 1111) a new subsection (d) as follows:

"(d) Support to National Drug Enforcement Policy Board. One of the duties of the White House Office of Drug Abuse Policy shall be to insure coordination between the National Drug Law Enforcement Policy Board and the health issues associated with drug abuse.

SEC. 7. This Act shall be effective January 20, 1985.

Amend the title to read as follows: "To establish a National Drug Enforcement Policy Board.".

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, with the adoption of this amendment, which, as I say, has been concurred in by Senator BIDEN, the floor manager of the bill, and by Senator THURMOND, the floor manager on this side, this is simply the amendment which sets up the drug enforcement policy board, which is chaired by the Attorney General.

This is the board charged with developing policy with respect to strategy and budgetary priorities aimed at facilitating this coordination between the law enforcement agencies. It will coordinate the gathering and evaluation of intelligence in this area.

As chairman of the board, the Attorney General will be the primary adviser to the President, and he is also authorized to provide guidance relating to those matters, including reviewing programs and reprograming, and the board would be required to report to Congress biannually.

The amendment simply then goes on to say that it will not interfere with routine law enforcement or intelligence decisions of any agency.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment, unless there is further discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment (No. 2700) was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, it seems as though this is going to be a good day for the Senate and I hope the country, although I do not want to equate the two. After some time, the President just announced that there is going to be a phase withdrawal of the marines from Lebanon and after a longer period of time, it looks like we have some unanimity on the so-called drug czar bill.

I am prepared on behalf of myself and Senator DECONCINI and Senator PELL, who were deeply involved in this legislation for the past several years, to accept the amendment that has been put forward by Senator SIMPSON on behalf of Senator THURMOND and others.

Mr. President, I commend Senator THURMOND for his initiative in this area. It is not everything I wanted, but it is pretty darn close.

I think we made a good compromise here. What we have essentially done here is what we tried—and I must admit Senator THURMOND and I both tried—to convince the President to do a year and some months ago in the Oval Office just before we recessed which was to essentially establish for the drug area the equivalent of a DCI, Director of Central Intelligence, and with the same type of authority.

Without taking the time of the Senate, because I know a number of my colleagues have to catch planes and have places to go, and since we debated this thing so many times and we passed it twice already, I will not take a lot of time.

But I would like to point out that the administration did move some on this but they did not propose much more than establishing a board that already exists. Senator THURMOND's amendment give the Attorney General, the chairman of the board, the authority to carry out policy and budget decisions approved by the board. The Attorney General also becomes, by statute, the primary adviser to the President and the Congress on drugs.

The reason that is important is we would like to be able to call somebody up and find out what the policy is and know who is in charge—who is on first and who is on second and what the game plan is.

I concur with this compromise because it gives the Attorney General sufficient clout to clearly bring coordination and central management to our omnibus drug problem.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I strongly support the compromise proposal to establish a National Drug Enforcement Policy Board. This is a proposal Senator DECONCINI, Senator BIDEN and I initiated several years ago and certaintly the need for this Cabinet-level Board is greater today than ever before. The Senate has passed virtually identical proposals by solid majorities on two separate occasions, and I am hopeful that on this third effort we will be successful in enacting this long needed initiative into law.

The legislation we are proposing is really very simple. At least 15 separate Federal agencies play a role in drug enforcement, and these agencies are spread through six different departments. Coordination and leadership of our drug enforcement programs is such a complex and diverse job that it requires the principal attention and responsibility of one person within the Cabinet. The General Accounting Office, in a report last summer entitled "Federal Drug Interdiction Efforts Need Strong Central Oversight," strongly criticized the fragmentation of the Federal antidrug effort. The GAO recommended that the President develop an overall national strategy that better defines the roles of the many agencies involved with this problem. The GAO also called for a clear delegation of responsibility to one individual to lead and coordinate Federal drug enforcement programs.

I do not believe that any Member of the Senate would dispute the need for a more aggressive national attack on the drug trafficking problem. Drug trafficking and abuse are no longer a problem that is contained in our large cities; the health impairment and crime that flow from this problem are evident today in every neighborhood in the United States. We have enjoyed successes in containing the problem, such as the much-heralded Florida Task Force, but in reducing the problem in that area we have seen trafficking activity shift to other regions of the country.

Last fall I conducted a hearing of the Foreign Relations Committee in Rhode Island on the sources of the drug trafficking problem in New England. Testimony clearly indicated that coastal smuggling of drugs has increased significantly in New England since the marshaling of Federal efforts in south Florida. While the law enforcement personnel who testified were uniform in citing the successes that have been achieved, they were frank to admit that—as far as putting a dent in drug trafficking operations—we are only touching the tip of an iceberg. Just last week the President released a budget which reduces funding for the Coast Guard, the agency principally concerned with stopping coastal drug smuggling. It is anticipated that the budget recommendations will result in the cut of over 650 military billets and about 100 civilian positions. These cuts will have a real impact on the Coast Guard's law enforcement effectiveness, and underscore the fact that our overtasked and underfunded agencies are outmatched in fighting a war against a well-organized, well-financed $80 billion a year industry. What we are seeking to do with this bill is to provide the high level of leadership that has been lacking from our drug control efforts, and I am satisfied that the Cabinet-level Board—which will be chaired by the Attorney General—will have the necessary power to both establish national and implement a more effective drug enforcement policy.

We have all seen the effects of drug trafficking in our communities, and we all recognize that—by its very nature—the sources of this problem cannot be reached by local law enforcement. This bill is a first step in an all-out national attack on the drug trafficking menace, and I urge each of my colleagues to join in providing the strong leadership that is essential to dealing with this growing national problem.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, as far as this side of the aisle is concerned, I do not know that anyone wishes to speak or seeks a rollcall vote. I am prepared to yield back all of my time and voice vote this if that is agreeable with the manager, Senator SIMPSON.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I have nothing further to add on behalf of the floor manager of the bill except to say, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, that I have personally observed how Senator THURMOND and Senator BIDEN have worked so closely on this measure. We have a fine result, in my mind. I commend them both, knowing that it has been something of great interest to them. It has been a privilege to be involved in it as a member of the committee.

There are no requests for a rollcall vote on this side of the aisle. I yield back the balance of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

So the bill (S. 1787), as amended, was passed as follows:

S. 1787

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Narcotics Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby makes the following findings:

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in a few moments I am going to attempt to get to the death penalty bill, but I do not anticipate completing action on that measure tonight. Therefore, may I announce that there will be no more record votes today.

Mr. President, the managers of that measure are not here. I wish to talk to the minority leader before we proceed. For the moment, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistance legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the leadership on this side still intends to go or attempt to go to the death penalty bill tonight. While we try to get managers here and on deck, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend past the hour of 7 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF THE CITIZENS' COMMISSION ON HUNGER IN NEW ENGLAND

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, yesterday the Citizens' Commission on Hunger in New England released its report, "American Hunger Crisis: Poverty and Health in New England." The Commission, composed of 25 eminent individuals and experts in the fields of medicine and nutrition and chaired by Dr. Larry Brown of the Harvard School of Public Health, has gathered concrete data documenting the tragic reality of hunger in our country.

The Commission's principal findings are that:

Hunger exists in every State in New England, has been growing at a steady pace over the past 3 years and shows no sign of diminishing.

A new class of poor people who have never been poor or hungry before has recently emerged and appears to be growing.

There is a growning body of evidence that malnutrition is becoming a serious problem among poor children in the United States. Among the studies cited by the Commission are the 1983 Massachusetts Nutrition Survey which found 9.8 percent of the children studied to be chronically malnourished and 12.2 percent to be anemic; a national survey of 400,000 low income children, conducted by the Center for Disease Control, found that 8.5 percent of those children were stunted and 7 percent were anemic.

According to social service workers and doctors who testified before the Commission, it is nearly impossible for the elderly poor to eat adequately under current economic conditions.

These findings should not surprise the Members of this body and they are certainly no surprise to me. During the last 2 years almost a dozen independent studies conducted by the Conference of Mayors, the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, the Food Research and Action Center, and other groups have produced clear, convincing, and overwhelming evidence that hunger exists and that the number of hungry people in America is growing.

In December I submitted my own report, "Going Hungry in America," to the Senate Labor Committee detailing my own findings and recommendations following 5 days of hearings around the country, and in which I reached the same conclusions about the seriousness of the hunger crisis. Only one report, the report issued by President Reagan's Task Force on Food Assistance Programs, has reached a contrary conclusion.

As we begin this year's budget debate, all of us in the Congress have a responsibility to act in light of the growing body of evidence on the extent of hunger in our society. In its excellent new study, the New England commission carefully examines the history of the Government's response to the problems of the needy and places the blame for the current hunger crisis squarely on the shoulders of the Federal Government.

Regressive policy choices have created the hunger problem and there is no secret about what must now be done. Increased funding for Federal food assistance programs—most of which must be reauthorized in this Congress—can make the difference.

Congress has the power to put America back on the path of progress toward the eradication of hunger. I welcome the report of the citizen's commission as an important new contribution to our understanding of the issue.

On behalf of the commission chairman, Larry Brown, of the Harvard School of Public Health, I am today providing each Member of the Senate with a copy of the report. I urge all of my colleagues to read it with the care it deserves.

HEALTH CARE FOR AMERICA'S DISABLED VETERANS: THE GRACE COMMISSION THREAT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, this morning at a joint hearing of the House and Senate Committees on Veterans' Affairs, the National Commander of the Disabled American Veterans, Dennis A. Joyner, presented that great organization's legislative recommendations for 1984. In his very excellent testimony, Commander Joyner focused on the threat to veterans' programs posed by a number of the recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control—the so-called Grace Commission.

My statement for the joint hearing responded to the DAV testimony on that point, and I would like to reiterate for the information of my colleagues and the public part of my remarks.

Mr. President, I had to agree with the DAV's National Commander that the threats to Veterans' Administration health care and benefits programs that he identified are quite real and current.

Last week, Office of Management and Budget Director David Stockman, appearing before the Senate Budget Committee, testified that the Grace Commission proposals for veterans' programs are receiving serious consideration. On February 2, Mr. Stockman stated:

> While major strides in budget control have been achieved over the past three years, it should not be concluded that all savings possibilities have been exhausted. . . . [T]he Grace Commission report contains literally hundreds of suggestions . . . which, after further analysis and refinement, can be expected to generate substantial savings proposals for next year's budget.
> In particular, the following eight budget categories illustrate the opportunities for significant future savings beyond the limited measures proposed in the 1985 budget. . . . [T]hey illustrate both the major opportunities as well as the kind of hard choices which will face the Administration and Congress next year in what must be a full throttle effort to close the budget gap, if economic recovery is to be sustained.
> * * * * *
> (3) Veterans Health Care System Efficiencies and Improvements
>
> . . . [T]he Grace Commission findings, as well as those by many medical economists, suggests that the nation's health care commitments to its veterans can be met at substantially less cost over the longer run if the current policy framework is adjusted. Such structural reform options include greater internal economic incentives, wider use of excess facilities in the private health care system, tighter implementation of the "inability to defray" standard, firmer service-connected disability requirements, and cost-sharing and third-party cost recovery mechanisms. The Administration will be studying these options intensively within the coming years, with a view to finding ways to meet existing veterans health care commitments at significantly lower costs in the years ahead. . . . [Emphasis added.]

Mr. President, I must confess that I sometimes find it difficult to understand exactly what Mr. Stockman has in mind. But I know from long experience that he is no advocate for the Nation's veterans or of the VA health-care system. When he talks about adjusting "the current policy framework" and about "structural reform options" for VA health care, warning flags need to be raised immediately, and we have all got to be on the watch.

When he speaks of "wider (VA) use of excess facilities in the private health care system," it seems reasonably likely that he is talking about resurrecting "mainstreaming"—the often rejected and discredited idea that, instead of maintaining a strong independent VA health care system, the Federal Government should increasingly be meeting veterans' needs through contracts with private facilities that have overbuilt and are overbedded. I consider that to be the first step toward dismantling the VA health care system. I have always been opposed to that notion, and I will fight it whenever it is proposed.

It was only 16 months ago that the Congress enacted in Public Law 97-306 legislation I proposed declaring the policy of the United States that the VA "shall maintain a comprehensive, nationwide health care system for the direct provision of quality health-care services to eligible veterans. . . ." Ronald Reagan signed that bill into law on October 14, 1982, but apparently Mr. Stockman has failed to read this provision. Either that or he chooses to ignore it.

I am not entirely clear what Mr. Stockman means when he says that he is considering firmer service-connected disability requirements. Since an award of disability compensation carries with it eligibility for VA health care, Mr. Stockman's reference seems most likely to be to the Grace Commission's call for a detailed review of the VA's disability compensation program because it found the program "more generous than comparable private sector programs or than the public realizes or understands." As far as I am concerned, it is the Grace Commission—not the public—that does not understand.

Mr. Stockman's reference to "cost-sharing . . . mechanisms" as one of several "structural reform options" the administration is studying intensively is also extremely vague. Surely, Mr. Stockman has much more in mind than the VA-Department of Defense resource sharing program under legislation enacted in May 1982. That established, ongoing program cannot be what he means by a "structural reform."

Mr. President, there is clearly a need for the Nation's veterans and their friends in the Congress to be on guard against Grace Commission/OMB initiatives that could do great harm to veterans' programs. I am very pleased that the DAV is alert to the threat, and I want to join them in helping to insure that all Senators are also made aware of some very ominous handwriting on the wall for veterans' programs.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 2259. A bill to amend title 28 of the United States Code to encourage prompt, informal, and inexpensive resolution of civil cases by use of arbitration in U.S. district courts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COURT-ANNEXED ARBITRATION ACT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the volume of civil litigation in the Federal courts today has, by all accounts, become unmanageable. The some 200,000 civil cases presently pending there threaten the very underpinnings of our Federal judicial system. Ever-increasing case loads, resulting court backlogs, and dilatory litigants, have combined to produce an untenable situation for judges and litigants alike.

Modern Federal litigation is not merely protracted, it is also expensive. The substantial costs of discovery and pretrial preparation are often never recouped, even by injured parties with legitimate grievances. In some cases litigation costs far outweigh the amount in controversy. The epidemic asbestos litigation now clogging the Federal courts is a sorry example of how complex litigation can compensate lawyers, yet leave injured claimants without meaningful awards.

In an attempt to reduce the volume of cases in the Federal district courts, and the cost of trying them, I am today introducing legislation which would provide for the mandatory, nonbinding arbitration of certain classes of civil actions in our Federal trial courts. The proposal would require that litigants in cases involving claims for money damages of $50,000 or less, generally involving personal injury or contract matters, submit to arbitration before one or more arbitrators, who would be assigned by the court to hear cases in their particular area of expertise; 6 months after filing their case the parties would appear before the arbitration panel for a hearing. The arbitrators' judgment on the merits would be entered as the judgment of the court unless, within 30 days, a party rejects the award by filing a demand for a trial de novo.

The proposal has two important objectives. First, it would compel parties to a lawsuit to obtain what is essentially an advisory verdict through a trial-like proceeding. Such a procedure serves the dual purpose of either resolving the parties' dispute or, that failing, to provide the basis for a posthearing settlement. Second, by setting a firm date for the arbitration hearing, 6 months from the date of initiating the suit, the procedure sets a deadline for preparation of the case. Counsel are thus obliged to give prompt attention to the matter, thereby increasing the likelihood of early settlement.

Since 1978 three Federal district courts have, by local rule, been experimenting with mandatory referral of certain types of cases to court-annexed arbitration. One of those courts is in my own State of Pennsylvania. Results from these districts are positive. Findings indicate that the program expedites the disposition of cases, and that lawyers view the procedure favorably. Moreover, there is strong evidence that mandatory arbitration reduces the expense of Federal litigation.

Mr. President, the number of civil cases pending in the Federal courts has doubled in the past 10 years. The system is overworked and injured parties are held hostage by delay. If enacted, this proposal would provide litigants with an efficient and inexpensive method of resolving disputes, while reserving to them the option of proceeding to trial if either party is dissatisfied with the outcome of the arbitration. I urge my colleagues to join with me in support of this important proposal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2259

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds and declares that—

(a) in many Federal judicial districts, parties to civil litigation experience lengthy delays and avoidable expense in the adjudication of their litigation;

(b) the burgeoning caseload of the United States district courts has placed enormous burdens on the federal judiciary;

(c) if alternative means of dispute resolution are not found, it may be necessary to increase the size of the federal judiciary to such an extent that its prestige will be diluted, and its vitality sapped;

(d) court-annexed arbitration has proven in the state courts to be an effective and fair means of adjudicating many kinds of civil disputes;

(e) experiments since 1978 in the Northern District of California and the Eastern District of Pennsylvania have demonstrated the utility and necessity in the federal system of mandatory referral of certain types of cases to court-annexed arbitration.

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this legislation to promote the prompt, informal, and inexpensive resolution of civil disputes by mandating arbitration for certain types of civil cases.

"(2) The court may return an action described in section 644(a)(1)(B)(ii) or 644(a)(2)(B)(1)(b) for arbitration if at any time before the commencement of trial the court determines that the nonmonetary claims in the case are insubstantial and returns the case to the clerk with a statement of such determination. The clerk promptly shall refer any such case to arbitration and in no event more than one hundred and twenty days after such determination.

"(b) The arbitration shall be conducted before a panel of three arbitrations, unless the parties agree to have it conducted before a single arbitrator. The parties may by agreement select any person or persons to conduct the arbitration. The arbitrators may refuse to receive into evidence any exhibit, a copy or photograph of which has not been delivered to the adverse party, as provided herein.

"(e) A party may have a recording and transcript made of the arbitration hearing at his expense. If a party has a transcript or a tape recording made, he shall furnish a copy of the transcript or tape recording without charge to any other party and to the court.

The judgment so entered shall be subject to the same provisions of law, and shall have the same force and effect, as a judgment of the court in a civil action, except that it shall not be subject to appeal.

"(d) If the party who demanded a trial de novo fails to obtain a judgment in the district court, exclusive of interest and costs, more favorable to him than the arbitration award, he shall be assessed the costs of the arbitration proceeding, including the amount of the arbitration fees, and—

"(1) if he is a plaintiff and the arbitration award were in his favor, he shall pay to the court an amount equivalent to interest on the arbitration award from the time it was filed; or

(b) This Act shall take effect one hundred and twenty days after the date of enactment, except that subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of enactment.

SEC. 8. There is authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1983, to the judicial branch of the Government such sums as may be necessary to be allocated by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts to Federal judicial districts and the Federal Judicial Center to carry out the purposes of this Act. By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 2260. A bill to amend section 1407(h) of title 28, United States Code, to permit the consolidation of antitrust actions for trial; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSOLIDATION OF COMPLEX ANTITRUST CASES

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, complex antitrust cases are the bane of the Federal judiciary. In view of this fact I today introduce a bill which would greatly simplify the handling of such cases, both by the courts, and by those practitioners who must navigate the already tortuous seas of complex antitrust litigation. Very simply, the bill would allow civil antitrust actions to be consolidated for trial, as well as pretrial proceedings, in a single Federal district court.

Presently, the Multidistrict Litigation Act, title 28, United States Code, section 1407, authorizes the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation to transfer civil antitrust actions to a single district court for consolidated and coordinated pretrial proceedings. Moreover, in parens patriae actions brought under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, cases in which State attorneys general bring actions on behalf of consumers, such actions may be consolidated for trial as well as pretrial proceedings, thereby sparing defendants multiple trials in multiple forums following coordinated pretrial proceedings. Today's bill would allow the consolidation for trial of all actions brought under the Clayton Act.

At the outset I want to emphasize that this proposal will impose no additional financial burden on the Federal Government. It will, however, greatly facilitate and accelerate the consideration of complex antitrust matters by the courts, and will produce substantial economies in the utilization of scarce judicial resources, and in litigation expenses generally. It would do so by allowing a complex case—which is often hundreds of individual actions arising from the same operative facts—to be litigated once in a single district court. Under existing law litigants are confronted with the anomalous situation of conducting all of their pretrial proceedings before a single judge, only to have subsequent trial proceedings fragmented in a host of other forums. Obviously, the risk of inconsistent results is substantial.

This proposal does not, however, mandate such consolidation. Nothing here would alter the existing authority of the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation to order separate trials where they appeared to be warranted. The bill merely empowers the panel to consolidate related Clayton Act cases for trial, where to do so would promote judicial economy and general efficiency.

Proposals of this sort have been before the Judiciary Committee in the past. For instance, in the 96th Congress a similar proposal was included in S. 300, a bill which would have legislatively overturned the Illinois Brick decision. Although the Illinois Brick issue was controversial and hotly debated, there was virtually unanimous support for the provisions which would have allowed consolidation of multiple actions arising from the same operative facts.

In the last Congress Senator DECONCINI introduced a similar bill, denominated S. 2624. That bill was, however, somewhat different from that which I introduce today. Specifically, S. 2624 would have allowed consolidation for trial of actions brought under section 4 or section 4C of the Clayton Act, while my proposal would allow consolidation in all actions brought under the Clayton Act.

For years actual practice under the multidistrict statute has, despite the clear limitation therein, been for the transferee court to retain the coordinated case after pretrial procedures have been completed, for purposes of a consolidated trial. Today's proposal would merely provide legislative authority for such a practice.

In conclusion, I urge my colleagues to support this important measure, which in my view would go far toward simplifying the management of complex cases, and thereby conserve critical judicial resources.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2260

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1407(h) of title 28, United States Code is amended by striking "under section 4C of the Clayton Act" and inserting in lieu thereof "under the Clayton Act".

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 2261. A bill to provide for an award of prejudgment interest on claims arising under the laws, treaties, and Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PREJUDGMENT INTEREST

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the past several years have seen a marked increase in enthusiasm, both among courts and commentators, for the notion of prejudgment interest as a normal incident of civil litigation. That enthusiasm pales, however, when compared to that of plaintiffs, faced with the increasing delays and mounting costs which are incidental to civil litigation today. Prejudgment interest already authorized by statute in at least six States, at Federal maritime law, and under the antitrust laws, serves two purposes: It discourages dilatory behavior by defendants, and it compensates plaintiffs for defendants' use of plaintiffs' money until the time of judgment. To promote these important objectives I am today introducing a bill to provide for an award of prejudgment interest on claims arising under the laws, treaties and Constitution of the United States. If enacted, I believe this measure will help to insure more equitable treatment for all participants in the judicial process, and, just as important, help to relieve the congestion which presently plagues the Federal courts.

The principal purpose of this measure is to discourage delay in civil court proceedings. Research indicates that there is, in tort cases for example, a positive relationship between the size of a claim and the length of the delay before trial and eventual judgment. The explanation is simple: The longer a defendant can delay settlement or judgment, the more time he has to earn interest on the money which will eventually be paid to the plaintiff. Any lawyer who has ever been involved in commercial litigation knows that it is a time-honored strategy for defense counsel to draw out pretrial proceedings as long as possible, to allow his delay-minded client to retain the use of money earmarked for eventual judgment or settlement. The result is that plaintiffs are denied judgments to which they are rightfully entitled, and at the same time incur substantially increased legal fees—the cost of their own attorneys' unnecessarily prolonged labors.

Stalling tactics also produce myriad superfluous motions, briefs and other discovery papers, all of which unnecessarily burden the already overworked Federal courts. It does not require a mathematician's skills to calculate the time savings to the courts if prejudgment interest were to effect even a modest 20-percent reduction in the time between initiating a lawsuit and its eventual disposition, assuming a correlative 20-percent reduction in pretrial practice. Moreover, civil dockets in the Federal courts could be expected to shrink accordingly, thereby increasing the very availability of justice at the Federal bench.

Prejudgment interest also serves to make plaintiffs whole. Where it is not allowed, plaintiffs suffer an additional loss, a loss in income until judgment, a loss which becomes a windfall to the party at fault. To provide for prejudgment interest in an award of damages does nothing more than compensate plaintiffs for the moneys they could have earned had judgment not been delayed.

Prejudgment interest is not a new idea. A majority of jurisdictions allow it as a matter of right for injuries to property. At least six States provide for it by statute. Federal courts have been willing to award it even where explicit statutory authority was lacking, in Death on the High Seas Act cases for instance.

Today's bill is a simple one. It would add a new section to chapter 125 of title 28 of the United States Code. Prejudgment interest would only be available on claims arising under Federal law. It would not be available in cases before the court under its diversity jurisdiction. Such interest would accumulate from the date of service of a party's pleading setting forth a claim or counterclaim, until the entry of judgment, or offer of judgment if the judgment finally obtained were not more favorable than such offer. The rate of interest would be tied to the rate of interest on 3-year Treasury bills as of the date of commencing the action. Prejudgment interest would not be available: First, where a party failed to plead it; second, where in the view of the court plaintiff had been dilatory in prosecuting the action; third, on amounts awarded as statutory penalties; fourth on losses which would not be incurred until after judgment; or fifth, where it would be duplicative of some other award.

Although this proposed legislation is likely to have few supporters among liability insurers and the litigation defense Bar, I hope that my colleagues will join me in supporting this simple but effective measure to correct some of the more manifest abuses in Federal litigation today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2261

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 125 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"§ 1965. Prejudgment interest

"(a) Unless otherwise required by law, in awarding damages to a party on a claim arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, the court shall add to the sum of actual damages awarded, a sum of prejudgment interest computed at the rate of interest equal to the prevailing yield on Treasury securities with three years remaining to maturity (as published by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and termed 'Treasury Constant Maturities') as of the date of service of a party's pleading setting forth a claim against whom damages are being awarded, and measured from such service to the entry of judgment, or offer of judgment if the judgment finally obtained is not more favorable than such offer.

"(b) Prejudgment interest shall not be awarded:

(1) on losses which will not be incurred until after judgment;

(2) where such an award would be duplicative of some other sum awarded;

(3) where a party fails to plead it;

(4) where in the Court's view, plaintiff has been dilatory in prosecuting the action; and

(5) on amounts awarded as statutory penalties.

"(c) Any party whose claim includes a prayer for prejudgment interest shall include in the papers stating such claim a statement of the rate of interest provided for in subsection (b) above.".

SEC. 2. The analysis of chapter 125 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding after the item relating to section 1964 the following:

"1965. Prejudgment Interest".

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself and Mr. WARNER):

S. 2262. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to revise the pay structure of the police forces of the Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FEDERAL AIRPORT POLICE SALARY ACT

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation along with my colleague from Virginia, Senator WARNER, to correct the serious pay problem of Federal Aviation Administration airport police. This legislation will establish a statutory special pay rate for these law enforcement personnel. A companion measure has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman WOLF of Virginia.

Washington National Airport and Dulles International Airport are the only federally owned and operated airports in the country. The Federal police officers at these airports have significant and unique job responsibilities.

Police at these two airports provide protection to approximately 50,000 people each day. The airports' boundaries encompass approximately 11,000 acres, much of which must be patrolled 24 hours a day to maintain adequate security. In contrast to most other Federal police forces, the airport police function in an open environment. Passengers and visitors to the airports have almost total access to these facilities and the number of people using National and Dulles Airports continues to grow. The variety of situations that must be dealt with on a daily basis by the police includes violent crimes such as murder, robbery, and aggravated assault, as well as possession and/or distribution of drugs, possession of weapons, and fraud.

In addition to these security requirements, both airports serve elected officials of the United States and leaders and diplomats from around the world. As a result, these airports are potential targets for terrorist activity, subject to considerable media attention, and therefore require a heightened security.

While officers at these airports are required to provide the level and scope of police coverage greater than or at least comparable to the law enforcement requirements of an average-sized community, the pay for FAA police officers is significantly lower than other comparable civil service employees, other Federal law enforcement personnel, and area police departments.

Since 1969, FAA police officers have received only one pay adjustment. This came in 1974 with the adoption of the Department of Transportation's special pay rates request. However, regulatory pay requests are only temporary and include sunset provisions. As a result, this attempt to provide equitable pay for these officers had completely eroded by 1979.

Today, the pay for FAA police ranges anywhere from $3,200 to $6,600 less than salaries for police officers at the Library of Congress and Park Service, respectively. Compared to local non-Federal jurisdictions and to police forces of other airports, pay for FAA police is similarly low. As a result, the FAA police force has great difficulty retaining trained personnel.

The Department of Transportation recently attempted to redress this situation through a special pay rates package which was submitted to the Office of Personnel Management. Unfortunately, OPM provided only marginal relief.

Clearly, regulatory relief has proven to be an inadequate means of addressing this pay problem. For this reason, the legislation I am introducing establishes a statutory special pay rate for airport police officers. This legislation is consistent with other previously passed legislation establishing special pay rates for other Federal police forces such as the Library of Congress, National Zoo, and the U.S. Park Service.

I believe that the recent pay proposal made by the Department of Transportation represents a sound and reasoned approach to providing pay parity for the FAA police with other Federal law enforcement personnel. Therefore, the pay package request of Secretary Dole is incorporated in this legislation. The figures used in deriving the pay schedule listed in my bill were determined through a composite of the pay rates for other Federal police officers and the police departments of the surrounding metropolitan area.

I believe that this pay relief is urgently needed in order to correct the existing pay inequities of the FAA police force. If the FAA police force is to properly perform its mission, the officers must receive adequate compensation. I urge my colleagues to join with me in pressing for timely consideration of this important legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:
